My name is Adam Jacot de Boinod and I’m hopelessly addicted to strange words. I’ve spent the last six years compulsively hunting down unusual vocabulary and now have written three books collecting my very best and most unusual discoveries.

All three are included in this volume, which I’ve called I Never Knew There Was a Word For It, because I didn’t. My vocabulary is now ten times richer than it was six years ago, as I hope yours will soon be too … Let me tell you a little about each book:

The Meaning of Tingo

My interest in unusual words was triggered when one day, working as a researcher for the BBC programme QI, I picked up a weighty Albanian dictionary to discover that they have no less than twenty-seven words for eyebrow and the same number for different types of moustache, ranging from a mustaqe madh, or bushy, to a mustaqe posht, one which droops down at both ends.

My curiosity rapidly became a passion. I was soon unable to go near a bookshop or library without sniffing out the often dusty shelf where the foreign language dictionaries were kept. I started to collect my favourites: nakhur, for example, a Persian word meaning ‘a camel that gives no milk until her nostrils are tickled’; Many described strange or unbelievable things. How, when and where, for example, would a man be described as a marilopotes, the Ancient Greek for ‘a gulper of coaldust’? And could the Japanese samurai really have used the verb tsuji-giri, meaning ‘to try out a new sword on a passerby’? Others expressed concepts that seemed all too familiar. We have all met a zechpreller, ‘someone who leaves without paying the bill’; worked with a neko-neko, the Indonesian for ‘one who has a creative idea which only makes things worse’; or spent too much time with an ataoso, the Central American Spanish for ‘one who sees problems with everything’. It was fascinating to find thoughts that lie on the tip of an English tongue, crystallized into vocabulary. From the Zambian sekaseka, ‘to laugh without reason’, through the Czech nedovtipa, ‘one who finds it difficult to take a hint’, to the Japanese bakku-shan, ‘a woman who only appears pretty when seen from behind’.

In the end my passion became an obsession. I combed over two million words in countless dictionaries. I trawled the internet, phoned embassies, and tracked down foreign language speakers who could confirm my findings. I discovered that in Afrikaans, frogs go kwaak-kwaak, in Korea owls go buung-buung, while in Denmark Rice Crispies go Knisper! Knasper! Knusper! And that in Easter Island tingo means to borrow things from a friend’s house one by one until there’s nothing left.

Luckily for my sanity, Penguin then signed me up to write the book that was to become The Meaning of Tingo, which meant I had an editor to help me decide which of the thousands of great words should make it into the final book but, goodness, it was hard to leave some out. The book came out in 2005 and was an instant hit. It has since been published in eleven different languages and Tingomania spread all round the globe.

Toujours Tingo

I was delighted when the book’s fans demanded a sequel as I felt like I was only just getting started. This time I found such delights as okuri-okami, the Japanese word for ‘a man who feigns thoughtfulness by offering to see a girl home only to molest her once he gets in the door’ (literally, ‘a see-you-home wolf’); kaelling, the Danish for ‘a woman who stands on the steps of her house yelling obscenities at her kids’; and belochnik, the Russian for ‘a thief specializing in stealing linen off clothes lines’ (an activity that was supposedly very lucrative in the early 1980s). And how could I have missed the German Kiebitz, ‘an onlooker at a card game who interferes with unwanted advice’ or the Portuguese pesamenteiro, ‘one who habitually joins groups of mourners at the home of a deceased person, ostensibly to offer condolences but in reality to partake of the refreshments which he expects will be served’?

In this book I ventured into over two hundred new languages. The Ndebele of Southern Africa have the word dii-koyna, meaning ‘to destroy one’s own property in anger’, an impulse surely felt by most of us at some time or another, if not acted upon. From the Bakweri language of Cameroon we have wo-mba, a charming word to describe ‘the smiling in sleep by children’; and from the Buli language of Ghana the verb pelinti, ‘to move very hot food around inside one’s mouth in order to avoid too close a contact’. And doubtless there are many among us who have found ourselves disturbed by a butika roka (Gilbertese, Oceania) ‘a brother-in-law coming round too often’.

Once again, of course, many of the more unusual words relate closely to the local specifics of their cultures. Most of us are unlikely to need the verb sendula, (from the Mambwe of Zambia) meaning ‘to find accidentally a dead animal in the forest’, which carries with it the secondary meaning ‘and be excited at the thought that a lion or leopard might still be around’. But even if we never have the call to use these expressions, it’s surely enriching to know that in Finnish, poronkusema is ‘the distance equal to how far a reindeer can travel without urinating’; while manantsona, from the Malagasy of Madagascar, is ‘to smell or sniff before entering a house, as a dog does’. We may not share the same climate, but we can all too easily imagine the use of words like hanyauku, (Rukwangali, Namibia) ‘to walk on tiptoe on warm sand’, barbarian-on (Ik, Nilo-Saharan), ‘to sit in a group of people warming up in the morning sun’, or dynke (Norwegian), ‘the act of dunking somebody’s face in snow’.

Half as long again as The Meaning of Tingo, this second bite into the substantial cherry of world languages allowed me to venture in depth into all sorts of new areas. There are more examples of ‘false friends’, from the Czech word host, which confusingly means ‘guest’, to the Estonian sober, a perhaps unlikely word for ‘a male friend’. There are the intriguing meanings of the names of cities and countries, Palindromes and even national anthems, as well as a series of worldwide idioms, which join the words in confirming that the challenges, joys and disappointments of human existence are all too similar around the world. English’s admonitory ‘Don’t count your chickens’, for example, is echoed in most languages, becoming, in Danish: man skal ikke sælge skindet, før bjørnen er skudt ‘one should not sell the fur before the bear has been shot’; in Turkish, dereyi görmeden paçalari sivama, ‘don’t roll up your trouser-legs before you see the stream’ and in the Ndonga language of Namibia ino manga ondjupa ongombe inaayi vala, ‘don’t hang the churning calabash before the cow has calved’.

The Wonder Of Whiffling

While I was working on the previous two books, scouring libraries and second-hand bookshops, riffling through reference books from around the world to find words with unusual and delightful meanings, I kept coming across splendid English dictionaries too. Not just the mighty twenty-volume Oxford English Dictionary, but collections covering dialect, slang and subsidiary areas, such as Jamaican or Newfoundland English. Sneaking the occasional glance away from my main task I realized there was a wealth of little-known or forgotten words in our language, from its origins in Anglo-Saxon, through Old and Middle English and Tudor–Stuart, then on to the rural dialects collected so lovingly by Victorian lexicographers, the argot of nineteenth-century criminals, slang from the two world wars, right up to our contemporary world and the jargon that has grown up around such activities as darts, birding and working in an office. Offered the chance, it seemed only right to gather the best examples together and complete my trilogy: bringing, as it were, the dictionary coming across splendid English dictionaries too. Not just the mighty twenty-volume Oxford English Dictionary, but collections covering dialect, slang and subsidiary areas, such as Jamaican or Newfoundland English. Sneaking the occasional glance away from my main task I realized there was a wealth of little-known or forgotten words in our language, from its origins in Anglo-Saxon, through Old and Middle English and Tudor–Stuart, then on to the rural dialects collected so lovingly by Victorian lexicographers, the argot of nineteenth-century criminals, slang from the two world wars, right up to our contemporary world and the jargon that has grown up around such activities as darts, birding and working in an office. Offered the chance, it seemed only right to gather the best examples together and complete my trilogy: bringing, as it were, the original idea home.

Some of our English words mean much the same as they’ve always meant. Others have changed beyond recognition, such as racket, which originally meant the palm of the hand; grape, a hook for gathering fruit; or muddle, to wallow in mud. Then there are those words that have fallen out of use, but would undoubtedly make handy additions to any vocabulary today. Don’t most of us know a blatteroon (1645), a person who will not stop talking, not to mention a shot-clog (1599), a drinking companion only tolerated because he pays for the drinks. And if one day we feel mumpish (1721), sullenly angry, shouldn’t we seek the company of a grinagog (1565), one who is always grinning?

The dialects of Britain provide a wealth of coinages. In the Midlands, for example, we find a jaisy, a polite and effeminate man, and in Yorkshire a stridewallops, a tall and awkward woman. If you tuck too much into the clotted cream in Cornwall you might end up ploffy, plump; in Shropshire, hold back on the beer or you might develop joblocks, fleshy, hanging cheeks; and down in Wiltshire hands that have been left too long in the washtub are quobbled. The Geordies have the evocative word dottie for the tobacco left in the pipe after smoking, and in Lincolnshire charmings are paper and rag chewed into small pieces by mice. In Suffolk to muddle is to walk alone with the head held low; and in Hampshire to vuddle is to spoil a child by injudicious petting. And don’t we all know someone who’s crambazzled (Yorkshire), prematurely aged through drink and a dissolute life?

Like English itself, my research hasn’t stopped at the shores of the Channel. How about a call-dog (Jamaican English), a fish too small for human consumption or a twack (Newfoundland English) a shopper who looks at goods, inquires about prices but buys nothing. Slang from elsewhere offers us everything from a waterboy (US police), a boxer who can be bribed or coerced into losing, to a shubie (Australian), someone who buys surfing gear and clothing but doesn’t actually surf. In Canada, a cougar describes an older woman on the prowl for a younger man, while in the US a quirkyalone is someone who doesn’t fall in love easily, but waits for the right person to come along.

Returning to the mainstream, it’s good to know that there are such sound English words as rumblegumption, meaning common sense, or ugsomeness, loathing. Snirtle is to laugh in a quiet, suppressed or restrained manner, while to snoach is to speak through the nose. If you are clipsome, you are eminently embraceable; when clumpst, your hands are stiff with cold. To boondoggle is to carry out valueless work in order to convey the impression that one is busy, while to limbeck is to rack the brain in an effort to have a new idea.

As for whiffling, well, that turned out to be a word with a host of meanings. In eighteenth-century Oxford and Cambridge, a whiffler was one who examined candidates for degrees, while elsewhere a whiffler was an officer who cleared the way for a procession, as well as being the name for the man with the whip in Morris dancing. The word also means to blow or scatter with gusts of air, to move or think erratically, as well as applying to geese descending rapidly from a height once the decision to land has been made. In the underworld slang of Victorian times, a whiffler was one who cried out in pain, while in the cosier world of P.G. Wodehouse, whiffled was what you were when you’d had one too many of Jeeves’s special cocktails.

As a self-confessed bowerbird (one who collects an astonishing array of sometimes useless objects), I’ve greatly enjoyed putting together all three collections. I sincerely hope that you enjoy reading them, and that they save you both from mulligrubs, depression of spirits, and onomatomania, vexation in having difficulty finding the right word.

In compiling all three books I’ve done my level best to check the accuracy of all the words included, but any comments or even favourite examples of words of your own are welcomed at the book’s two websites: for foreign languages www.themeaningofingo.com – and for English www.thewonderofwhiffling.com (There were some very helpful responses to my previous books, for which I remain grateful.)

I am deeply grateful to the following people for their advice and help on all three books: Giles Andreae, Martin Bowden, Joss Buckley, Candida Clark, Anna Coverdale, Nick Emley, Natasha Fairweather, William Hartston, Beatrix Jacot de Boinod, Nigel Kempner, Nick and Galia Kullmann, Kate Lawson, Alf Lawrie, John Lloyd, Sarah McDougall, Yaron Meshoulam, Tony Morris, David Prest and David Shariatmadari.

In particular I must thank my agent, Peter Straus, my illustrator Sandra Howgate, my editor at Penguin, Georgina Laycock; and Mark McCrum for his invaluable work on the text.
The Meaning of Tingo

Meeting and Greeting

ai jiao de maque bu zhang rou (Chinese) sparrows that love to chirp won’t put on weight

¡Hola!

The first and most essential word in all languages is surely ‘hello’, the word that enables one human being to converse with another:

- aa (Diola, Senegal)
- beeta (Soninke, Mali, Senegal and Ivory Coast)
- bok (Croatian)
- boozhoo (Ojibwe, USA and Canada)
- daw-daw (Jutlandish, Denmark)
- ella (Awabakal, Australia)
- i ay (Huorani, Ecuador)
- khaunmykhyghyz (Bashkir, Russia)
- nark (Phorhépecha, Mexico)
- rozhbash (Kurdi, Iraq and Iran)
- samba (Lega, Congo)
- wali-wali (Limbe, Sierra Leone)
- xawaxan (Toltichi Yokuts, California, USA)
- yoga (Ateso, Uganda)
- yoyo (Kwakiutl, Canada)

But it may not even be a word. In the Gilbert Islands of the Pacific, arou pairi describes the process of rubbing noses in greeting. For the Japanese, bowing is an important part of the process and a sign of respect: ojigi is the act of bowing; eshaku describes a slight bow (of about 15 degrees); keirei, a full bow (of about 45 degrees); while saikeirei is a very low, worshipful type of bow that involves the nose nearly touching the hands. When one meets someone extremely important, one might even consider pekopeko, bowing one’s head repeatedly in a fawning or grovelling manner.
Just say the word

Sometimes a single word works hard. In Sri Lanka, for example, the Sinhala word ayubowan means not only ‘good morning’, but also ‘good afternoon’, ‘good evening’, ‘good night’ and ‘goodbye’.

Expectant

The frustration of waiting for someone to turn up is beautifully encapsulated in the Inuit word iktsuarpok, meaning ‘to go outside often to see if someone is coming’. As for the frustration of the caller, there’s always the Russian dozvonitsya which doesn’t simply mean to ring a doorbell, but to ring it until one gets an answer (it’s also used for getting through on the telephone).

Hey you!

Once the first encounter is out of the way the correct form of address is important. Most of us know the difference between the intimate French tu and the more impersonal (and polite) vous. A similar distinction exists in Arabic between anta (‘you’ singular) and antum (‘you’ plural) – addressing an important person with anta (anti is the feminine version) rather than antum would be considered impolite.

In Vietnam there are no fewer than eighteen words for ‘you’, the use of which depends on whom you are addressing, whether a child or a senior citizen, whether formally or informally. And in the Western Australian Aboriginal language of Jiwali there are four words for ‘we’: ngali means ‘we two including you’; ngaliju means ‘we two excluding you’; nganthurru means ‘we all including you’; and nganthurraju means ‘we all excluding you’.

Cripes!

Exclamations are generally used to express a sudden reaction: to something frightening, incredible, spectacular, shocking or wonderful. Best not attempted by the visitor, they are better heard from the mouth of the native speaker than read off the page:

- aaberdì (Algerian) a cry used when learning fearful news
- aawwah (Dardja, Algeria) a shout of doubt or hesitation
- aâx (Karuk, North America) how disgusting!
- aduh (Malay) ouch or wow!
- aduhai (Indonesian) an expression of admiration
- alaih (Ulwa, Nicaragua) gosh! goodness! help!
- alalau (Quechuan, Peru) brrr! (of cold)
- amit-amit (Indonesian) forgive me!
- ammazza (Italian) it’s a killer! wow!
- asshe (Hausa, Nigeria) a cry of grief at distressing news
- bambule (Italian) cheers! (preceding the lighting of a joint)
- cq (Albanian) a negative exclamation of mild disappointment
- hoppla (German) whoops!
- naa (Japanese) that’s great!
- nabocklish (Irish Gaelic) don’t meddle with it!
- oho (Hausa, Nigeria) I don’t care
- oop (Ancient Greek) a cry to make rowers stop pulling
- sa (Afrikaans) catch him!
- savul (Turkish) get out of the way!
- schwupp (German) quick as a flash
- shahbash (Anglo-Indian) well done! (or well bowled!, as said in cricket by a wicket-keeper to the bowler)
- tao (Chinese) that’s the way it goes
- taetae tiria (Cook Islands Maori) throw it away, it’s dirty!
- uf (Danish) ugh! yuk!
- usch då (Swedish) oh, you poor thing!
- y-eazziik (Dardja, Algeria) an expression used exclusively by women to criticize another person’s action
- zut (French) dash it!

Chinwag

The niceties of what in English is baldly known as ‘conversation’ are well caught in other languages:

- ho’oponopono (Hawaiian) solving a problem by talking it out
- samir (Persian) one who converses at night by moonlight
- begadang (Indonesian) to stay up all night talking
- glossalgos (Ancient Greek) talking till one’s tongue aches

Breakdown in communication

Whether the person you are talking to suffers from latah (Indonesian), the uncontrollable habit of saying embarrassing things, or from chenyin (Chinese), hesitating and muttering to oneself, conversation may not always be quite as we’d like it:

- catra patra (Turkish) the speaking of a language incorrectly and brokenly
- nyelonong (Indonesian) to interrupt without apology
- akkisuitok (Inuit) never to answer
- dui niu tanqin (Chinese) to talk over someone’s head or address the wrong audience (literally, to play the lute to a cow)

- ’a’ama (Hawaiian) someone who speaks rapidly, hiding their meaning from one person whilst communicating it to another
- dakat’ (Russian) to keep saying yes
- dialogue de sourds (French) a discussion in which neither party listens to the other (literally, dialogue of the deaf)
- mokita (Kiriwana, Papua New Guinea) the truth that all know but no one talks about

Tittle-tattle
Gossip – perhaps more accurately encapsulated in the Cook Island Maori word 'o'onitua, ‘to speak evil of someone in their absence’ – is a pretty universal curse. But it’s not always unjustified. In Rapa Nui (Easter Island) anga-anga denotes the thought, perhaps groundless, that one is being gossiped about, but it also carries the sense that this may have arisen from one’s own feeling of guilt. A more gentle form of gossip is to be found in Jamaica, where the patois word labrish means not only gossip and jokes, but also songs and nostalgic memories of school.

False friends

Those who learn languages other than their own will sometimes come across words which look or sound the same as English, but mean very different things. Though a possible source of confusion, these false friends (as linguists call them) are much more likely to provide humour – as any Englishwoman who says ‘bless’ to her new Icelandic boyfriend will soon discover:

- hubbi (Arabic) friendly
- kill (Arabic) good friend
- bless (Icelandic) goodbye
- no (Andean Sabela) correct
- aye (Amharic, Ethiopia) no
- fart (Turkish) talking nonsense
- machete (Aukan, Suriname) how

The unspeakable …

Cursing and swearing are practised worldwide, and they generally involve using the local version of a small set of words describing an even smaller set of taboos that surround God, the family, sex and the more unpleasant bodily functions. Occasionally, apparently inoffensive words acquire a darker overtone, such as the Chinese wang bah dahm, which literally means a turtle egg but is used as an insult for politicians. And offensive phrases can often be beguilingly inventive:

- zolst farliren aleh tseyner achitz eynm, un dos zol dir vey ton (Yiddish) may you lose all your teeth but one and may that one ache
- asi te tragues un pavo y todas las plumas se conviertan en cuchillas de afeitar (Spanish) may all your turkey’s feathers turn into razor blades

… the unmentionable

Taboo subjects, relating to local threats or fears, are often quirky in the extreme. Albanians, for example, never use the word for ‘wolf’. They say instead mbyllizogojen, a contraction of a sentence meaning ‘may God close his mouth’. Another Albanian taboo-contraction is the word for fairy, shtozovalle, which means ‘God increase their round-dances’. Similarly, in the Sami language of Northern Scandinavia and the Yakuts language of Russia, the original name for bear is replaced by a word meaning ‘our lord’ or ‘good father’. In Russian itself, for similar reasons, a bear is called a *medved’ or ‘honey-eater’.

… and the unutterable

In Masai the name of a dead child, woman or warrior is not spoken again and, if their name is also a word used every day, then it is no longer used by the bereaved family. The Sakalavas of Madagascar do not tell their own name or that of their village to strangers to prevent any mischievous use. The Todas of Southern India dislike uttering their own name and, if asked, will get someone else to say it.
Shocking soundalikes

The French invented the word ordinateur, supposedly in order to avoid using the first two syllables of the word computer (con is slang for vagina and pute for whore). Creek Indians in America avoid their native words for earth (fakki) and meat (apiswa) because of their resemblance to rude English words.

In Japan, four (shi) and nine (ku) are unlucky numbers, because the words sound the same as those for ‘death’ and ‘pain or worry’ respectively. As a result, some hospitals don’t have the numbers 4, 9, 14, 19, or 42 for any of their rooms. Forty-two (shi-ni) means to die, 420 (shi-ni-rei) means a dead spirit and 24 (ni-shi) is double death. Nor do some hospitals use the number 43 (shi-zan), especially in the maternity ward, as it means stillbirth.

Fare well

Many expressions for goodbye offer the hope that the other person will travel or fare well. But it is not always said. Yerdengh-nga is a Wagiman word from Australia, meaning ‘to clear off without telling anyone where you are going’. Similarly, in Indonesia, minggat means ‘to leave home for good without saying goodbye’.

On reflection

Snobs and chauffeurs

Words don’t necessarily keep the same meaning. Simple descriptive words such as ‘rain’ or ‘water’ are clear and necessary enough to be unlikely to change. Other more complex words have often come on quite a journey since they were first coined:

- al-kuhul (Arabic) originally, powder to darken the eyelids; then taken up by alchemists to refer to any fine powder; then applied in chemistry to any refined liquid obtained by distillation or purification, especially to alcohol of wine, which then was shortened to alcohol
- chauffeur (French) to heat; then meant the driver of an early steam-powered car; subsequently growing to chauffeur
- hashhashin (Arabic) one who smokes or chews hashish; came to mean assassin
- manu operare (Latin) to work by hand; then narrowed to the act of cultivating; then to the dressing that was added to the soil, manure
- prestige (French) conjuror’s trick; the sense of illusion gave way to that of glamour which was then interpreted more narrowly as social standing or wealth
- sine nobilitate (Latin) without nobility; originally referred to any member of the lower classes; then to somebody who despised their own class and aspired to membership of a higher one; thus snob
- theriake (Greek) an antidote against a poisonous bite; came to mean the practice of giving medicine in sugar syrup to disguise its taste; thus treacle

An Arabian goodbye

In Syrian Arabic, goodbye is generally a three-part sequence: a) bxatrak, by your leave; b) ma’assalama, with peace; c) ‘allaysallmak, God keep you. If a) is said first, then b) is the reply and then c) may be used. If b) is said first, then c) is obligatory.
-chi non ha cervello abbia gambe (Italian)
-he who has not got a good brain ought to have good legs

Use your onion …

English-speakers are not the only ones to use food metaphors –bean, loaf, noodle, etc. – to describe the head. The Spanish cebolla means both ‘head’ and ‘onion’, while the Portuguese expression cabeça d’alho xoxo literally means ‘he has a head of rotten garlic’ (in other words, ‘he is crazy’). Moving from vegetables to fruit, the French for ‘to rack your brains’ is se presser le citron – ‘to squeeze the lemon’.

… or use your nut

In Hawaii, a different item of food takes centre stage. The word puniu means ‘the skull of a man which resembles a coconut’. Hawaiian has also given the world the verb pana po’o, ‘to scratch your head in order to help you remember something you’ve forgotten’.

Pulling faces

The Arabic sabaha bi-wajhi means to begin the day by seeing someone’s face. Depending on their expression, this can be a good or bad omen:

* sgean (Scottish Gaelic) a wild look of fear on the face
* kao kara hi ga deru (Japanese) a blush (literally, a flame comes out of one’s face)
- verheult (German) puffy-faced and red-eyed from crying
- Backpfeifengesicht (German) a face that cries out for a fist in it

Greek face-slapping

There are several vivid Greek words for being slapped in the face, including sfaliara, hastouki, fappa, xestrefti, boufla, karpasia and sulta’meremet (‘the Sultan will put you right’). Batsos means both ‘a slap in the face’ and ‘a policeman’ (from the American use of the word ‘cop’ to mean ‘swipe’). Anapothi describes a backhanded slap, while tha fas bouketo, ‘you will eat a bunch of flowers’, is very definitely not an invitation to an unusual meal.

Windows of the soul

Eyes can be our most revealing feature, though the way others see them may not always be quite what we’d hoped for:

- makahakahaka (Hawaiian) deep-set eyeballs
- mata ego (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) eyes that reveal that a person has been crying
- ablaq-chashm (Persian) having intensely black and white eyes
- jegil (Malay) to stare with bulging eyes
- melotot (Indonesian) to stare in annoyance with widened eyes

All ears

English is not terribly helpful when it comes to characterizing ears, unlike, say, Albanian, in which people distinguish between veshok (‘small ones’) or veshak (‘ones that stick out’). Other languages are similarly versatile:

- tapawising (Ulwa, Nicaragua) pointed ears
- a suentola (Italian) flappy ears
- mboboyo (Bemba, Congo and Zambia) sore ears

Indonesian offers two useful verbs: nylentik, ‘to flick someone with the middle finger on the ear’, and menjewer, ‘to pull someone by the ear’. While the Russian for ‘to pull someone’s leg’ is veshat’ lapshu na ushi, which literally translates as ‘to hang noodles on someone’s ears’.

A real mouthful
In Nahuatl, the language of the Aztecs which is still spoken today in Mexico, camachaloa is ‘to open one’s mouth’, camapaca is ‘to wash one’s mouth’, and camapotonilizti is ‘to have bad breath’.

Getting lippy

Lips can be surprisingly communicative:

- zunda (Hausa, Nigeria) to indicate with one’s lips
- catkhara (Hindi) smacking either the lips or the tongue against the palate
- die beleidigte Leberwurst spielen (German) to stick one’s lower lip out sulkily (literally, to play the insulted liver sausage)
- ho'ouawaepu'u (Hawaiian) to stick the tongue under one’s lip or to jut out the chin and twist the lips to the side to form a lump (as a gesture of contempt)

Hooter

Noses are highly metaphorical. We win by a nose, queue nose to tail or ask people to keep their noses out of our business. Then, if they are annoying us, it’s that same protuberant feature we seize on:

- irgham (Persian) rubbing a man’s nose in the dirt
- hundekuq (Albanian) a bulbous nose, red at the tip
- nuru (Roviana, Solomon Islands) a runny nose
- engsang (Malay) to blow the nose with your fingers
- ufuruk (Turkish) breath exhaled through the nose

Albanian face fungus

Just below the nose may be found a feature increasingly rare in this country, but popular amongst males in many other societies. In Albania the language reflects an interest bordering on obsession, with no fewer than twenty-seven separate expressions for this fine addition to the upper lip. Their word for moustache is similar to ours (mustaqe) but once attached to their highly specific adjectives, things move on to a whole new level:

- madh bushy moustache
- holl thin moustache
- varur drooping moustache
- big handlebar moustache
- kacadre moustache with turned-up ends
- g的概率 moustache with tapered tips
- posht moustache hanging down at the ends
- fhes long broom-like moustache with bristly hairs
- dirs ur newly sprouted moustache (of an adolescent)
- rruar with the moustache shaved off to name but ten. The attention the Albanians apply to facial hair they also apply to eyebrows, with another twenty-seven words, including pencil-thin (vetullkalem), frowning (vetullvrenjtur), plucked (vetullhequr), knitted (vetullrrept), long and delicately shaped (vetullgajtan), thick (vetullor), joined together (vetullperpjekur), gloomy (vetullngrysur), or even arched like the crescent moon (vetullhen).

Bearded wonder

The Arab exclamation ‘God protect us from hairy women and beardless men’ pinpoints the importance of facial hair as a mark of rank, experience and attractiveness:

- gras bilong fes (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) a beard (literally, grass belonging to the face)
- hemigeneios (Ancient Greek) with only half a beard
- qarba (Persian) white hairs appearing in the beard
- sim-zanakh (Persian) with a silver chin
- poti (Tulu, India) a woman with a beard

False friends

- willing (Abowakal, Australia) lips
- buzz (Arabic) nipple
- bash (Zulu) head
- thumb (Albanian) teat
- finger (Yiddish) toe

Bad hair day

Hair on the top of the head – or the lack of it – remains a worldwide preoccupation:

- basribis (Ulwa, Nicaragua) having uneven, poorly cut hair
- daberkalk (Ullans, Northern Ireland) seaweed or uncontrollable long hair
- kudpalu (Tulu, India) a woman with uncombed hair
- kucir (Indonesian) a tuft left to grow on top of one’s otherwise bald head

… not forgetting the Indonesian word didis, which means ‘to search and pick up lice from one’s own hair, usually when in bed at night’.

Teething troubles

Why doesn’t English have an expression for the space between the teeth when Malay does – gigi rongak? And that’s not the only gap in our dental vocabulary:

- mrongos (Indonesian) to have ugly protruding upper teeth
- angil (Kapampangan, Philippines) to bare the fangs like a dog
- laglerolarpok (Inuit) the gnashing of teeth
- kashr (Persian) displaying the teeth in laughter
- zhaghzhagh (Persian) the chattering of the teeth from the cold or from rage

And that one bizarre word that few of us are ever likely to need:
• puccekuli (Tulu, India) a tooth growing after the eightieth year

Getting it in the neck

Although there are straightforward terms for the throat in almost all languages, it’s when it comes to describing how the throat is used that things get interesting:

• nwik-ga (Wagiman, Australia) to have a tickle in the throat
• ngaobera (Pascuense, Easter Island) a slight inflammation of the throat caused by screaming too much
• berdaham (Malaysian) to clear the throat, especially to attract attention
• kōkochōka (Nahuatl, Mexico) to make gulping sounds
• jarida biriqihi (Arabic) he choked on but couldn’t swallow saliva (from excitement, alarm or grief)
• o ka la nokonoko (Hawaiian) a day spent in nervous anticipation of a coughing spell

Armless in Nicaragua

In Ulwa, which is spoken in the eastern part of Nicaragua, no distinction is made between certain parts of the body. So, for example, wau means either a thigh or a leg, ting is an arm or a hand (and tingdak means missing an arm or a hand), tingmak is a finger or a thumb, tibur is either a wrist or an ankle, and kungbas means a beard, a moustache or whiskers.

Safe pair of hands

Other languages are more specific about our extremities and their uses:

• sakarlasmak (Turkish) to become butterfingered
• lutuka (Tulu, India) the cracking of the fingers
• angushti za’id (Persian) someone with six fingers
• zastrich’ (Russian) to cut one’s nails too short
• meshetmek (Turkish) to wipe with the wet palm of one’s hand
• anjali (Hindi) hollowed hands pressed together in salutation

Legging it

Undue attention is put on their shapeliness but the bottom line is it’s good to have two of them and they should, ideally, be the same length:

• papakata (Cook Islands Maori) to have one leg shorter than the other
• baguettes (French) thin legs (literally, chopsticks or long thin French loaves)
• x-bene (Afrikaans) knock-knees
• bulurin-suq (Persian) with thighs like crystal

Footloose

We don’t always manage to put our best one forward:

• zassledit’ (Russian) to leave dirty footmarks
• mencak-mencak (Indonesian) to stamp one’s feet on the ground repeatedly, getting very angry
• eshte thike me thike (Albanian) to stand toenail to toenail (prior to an argument)

Mind the gap
Several cultures have words to describe the space between or behind limbs: irqa (Khakas, Siberia) is the gap between spread legs, and awawa (Hawaiian) that between each finger or toe. While jahja in Wagiman (Australia) and waal in Afrikaans both mean the area behind the knee.

Skin deep

We describe it with just one word but other cultures go much further, whether it’s alang (Ulwa, Nicaragua), the fold of skin under the chin; aka’aka’a (Hawaiian), skin peeling or falling off after either sunburn or heavy drinking; or karelu (Tulu, India), the mark left on the skin by wearing anything tight. Another Ulwa word, yuputka, records something we have all experienced – having the sensation of something crawling on one’s skin.

Covering up

Once it comes to adding clothes to the human frame, people have the choice of either dressing up …

- tiré à quatre épingles (French) dressed up to the nines (literally, drawn to four pins)
- ’akapoe (Cook Islands Maori) donning earrings or putting flowers behind the ears
- angkin (Indonesian) a long wide cloth belt worn by women to keep them slim
- Pomadenhengst (German) a dandy (literally, a hair-cream stallion)
- FHCP (French) acronym of Foulard Hermès Collier Perles, Hermes scarf pearl necklace (a female Sloane Ranger) or down …

- opgeloen (Yiddish) a careless dresser
- padella (Italian) an oily stain on clothes (literally, a frying pan)
- Krawattenmuffel (German) one who doesn’t like wearing ties
- cotisuelto (Caribbean Spanish) one who wears the shirt tail outside of the trousers
- tan (Chinese) to wear nothing above one’s waist or just as they feel …

- sygekassebriller (Danish) granny glasses
- rash (Arabic) skirt worn under a sleeveless smock
- alyaska (Russian) anorak or moon-boots
- hachimaki (Japanese) headbands worn by males to encourage concentration and effort
- ujut’a (Quechuan, Peru) sandals made from tyres

English clothing

English words for clothes have slipped into many languages. Sometimes the usage is fairly literal, as in smoking to describe a dinner jacket in Swedish or Portuguese; or pants for a tracksuit in Spanish. Sometimes it’s more metaphorical: the Hungarians call jeans farmer, while their term for a T-shirt is polo. In Barbados the cloth used for the lining of men’s clothes is known as domestic. Sometimes it’s just an odd mix: the Danish for jeans, for example, is cowboybukser, while the Japanese sebiro means a fashionably cut suit, being their pronunciation of Savile Row, London’s famous street of tailors.

On reflection

Go whistle
On the tiny mountainous Canary Island of La Gomera there is a language called Silbo Gomero that uses a variety of whistles instead of words (in Spanish silbar means to whistle). There are four ‘vowels’ and four ‘consonants’, which can be strung together to form more than four thousand ‘words’. This birdlike means of communication is thought to have come over with early African settlers over 2500 years ago. Able to be heard at distances of up to two miles, the silbador was until recently a dying breed. Since 1999, however, Silbo has been a required language in La Gomera schools.

The Mazateco Indians of Oaxaca, Mexico, are frequently seen whistling back and forth, exchanging greetings or buying and selling goods with no risk of misunderstanding. The whistling is not really a language or even a code; it simply uses the rhythms and pitch of ordinary speech without the words. Similar whistling languages have been found in Greece, Turkey and China, whilst other forms of wordless communication include the talking drums (ntumpane) of the Kele in Congo, the xylophones used by the Northern Chin of Burma, the banging on the roots of trees practised by the Melanesians, the yodelling of the Swiss, the humming of the Chekiang Chinese and the smoke signals of the American Indians.
Movers and Shakers

mas vale rodear que no ahogar (Spanish) better go about than fall into the ditch

Shanks’s pony

There’s much more to walking than simply putting one foot in front of the other:

- berlenggang (Indonesian) to walk gracefully by swinging one’s hands or hips
- aradupopini (Tulu, India) to walk arm in arm or hand in hand
- uitwaaien (Dutch) to walk in windy weather for fun

- murr-ma (Wagiman, Australia) to walk along in the water searching for something with your feet
- ’akihi (Hawaiian) to walk off without paying attention to directions

Walking in Zimbabwe

The Shona-speaking people of Zimbabwe have some very specialized verbs for different kinds of walking: chakwaira, through a muddy place making a squelching sound; dowora, for a long time on bare feet; svavaira, huddled, cold and wet; minaira, with swinging hips; pushuka, in a very short dress; shwitaira, naked; sesera, with the flesh rippling; and tabvuka, with such thin thighs that you seem to be jumping like a grasshopper.

Malaysian movements

The elegant Malaysians have a highly specialized vocabulary to describe movement, both of the right kind, as in kontal-kontil, ‘the swinging of long earrings or the swishing of a dress as one walks’, and the wrong, as in jerangkang, ‘to fall over with your legs in the air’. Others include:

- kengkang to walk with your legs wide apart
- tenjack to limp with your heels raised
- kapai to flap your arms so as to stay afloat
- gayat feeling dizzy while looking down from a high place
- seluk to put your hand in your pocket
- bongkeng sprawling face down with your bottom in the air Ups …

Sometimes our movements are deliberately athletic, whether this involves hopping on one leg (vogget in Cornish, hinke in Danish), rolling like a ball (ajawyry in the Wayampi language of Brazil), or something more adventurous:

- angama (Swahili) to hang in mid-air
- vybafnout (Czech) to surprise someone by saying boo
- puiyarpo (Inuit) to show your head above water
- povskakat’ (Russian) to jump one after another
- tarere (Cook Islands Maori) to send someone flying through the air
- lele kawa (Hawaiian) to jump into the sea feet first

Lele kawa, of course, is usually followed by curglaff, Scottish dialect for the shock felt when plunging into cold water.

… and downs

But on other occasions there seems to be a banana skin waiting for us on the pavement:

- blart (Ullans, Northern Ireland) to fall flat in the mud
- lamhdanaka (Ulwa, Nicaragua) to collapse sideways (as when walking on uneven ground)
- tunuallak (Inuit) slipping and falling over on your back while walking
- kejeblos (Indonesian) to fall into a hole by accident
- apismak (Turkish) to spread the legs apart and collapse
- jeruhuk (Malay) the act of stumbling into a hole that is concealed by long grass

False friends

- gush (Albanian) to hug each other around the neck
- shagit (Albanian) to crawl on one’s belly
- snags (Afrikaans) during the night
- sofa (Icelandic) sleep
- purr (Scottish Gaelic) to headbutt

What-d’you-call-it

Just because there is no word for it in English doesn’t mean we haven’t done it or experienced it:

- mencolek (Indonesian) touching someone lightly with one finger in order to tease them
- wasoso (Hausa, Nigeria) to scramble for something that has been thrown
- idumbulu (Tulu, India) seizing each other tightly with both hands
- pfesezeny (Czech) being stiff from sitting in the same position too long
- ’alo’alo kiki (Hawaiian) to dodge the rain by moving quickly
- honuhonu (Hawaiian) to swim with the hands only
- engkoniomai (Ancient Greek) to sprinkle sand over oneself
- tallabe (Zarma, Nigeria) to carry things on one’s head without holding on to them
- gagrom (Boro, India) to search for a thing below water by trampling
- chonggang-chongget (Malay) to keep bending forward and then straightening (as a hill-climber)

When it all goes horribly wrong …
That sinking feeling, puangi (Cook Islands Maori), the sensation of the stomach dropping away (as in the sudden surge of a lift, plane, swing or a tossed boat), is something we know all too well, as are:

- dokidoki (Japanese) rapid pounding heartbeats caused by worry or surprise
- a’anu (Cook Islands Maori) to sit huddled up, looking pinched and miserable
- nggregeli (Indonesian) to drop something due to nerves
- bingildamak (Turkish) to quiver like jelly

… scarper

- baotou shucuon (Chinese) to cover one’s head with both hands and run away like a coward
- achaplinarse (Spanish, Central America) to hesitate and then run away in the manner of Charlie Chaplin

Learning to relax

In some parts of the world relaxation doesn’t necessarily mean putting your feet up:

- ongkang-ongkang (Indonesian) to sit with one leg dangling down
- naganaga (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) to squat without resting your buttocks on your heels
- ledorweddle (Welsh) to lie down while propping yourself up with one elbow
- karvat (Hindi) the side of the body on which one rests

Dropping off

Once we start relaxing, snoozing becomes an increasingly strong possibility. Both Danish, with raevesøvn, and Russian, with vpolglaza, have a word to describe sleeping with one eye open, while other languages describe other similar states of weariness:

- aiguttoa (Votic, Estonia) to yawn repeatedly
- teklak-tekluk (Indonesian) the head bobbing up and down with drowsiness
- utsura-utsura (Japanese) to fluctuate between wakefulness and being half asleep
- utouto (Japanese) to fall into a light sleep without realizing it
- tengkurap (Indonesian) to lie or sleep with the face downwards
- kulubut (Kapampangan, Philippines) to go under the blanket

Out for the count

Having achieved the state the Japanese describe as guuguu, ‘the sound of someone in a deep sleep accompanied by snoring’, we can either have a good night …

- bilita mpash (Bantu, Zaire) blissful dreams
- altjiranga mitjina (Aranda, Australia) the timeless dimensions of dreams
- ngarong (Dyak, Borneo) an adviser who appears in a dream and clarifies a problem
- rêve à deux (French) a mutual dream, a shared hallucination
- morgenfrisk (Danish) fresh from a good night’s sleep

… or a bad one:

- menceracan (Malay) to cry in one’s sleep
- kekau (Indonesian) to wake up from a nightmare
- igau (Malay) to talk while trapped in a nightmare
- kerinan (Indonesian) to oversleep until the sun is up
Whatever their length, words have provided excellent material for games from the earliest times. One of the more pleasing arrangements is the palindrome, which is spelt the same backwards as forwards, and can create some bizarre meanings:

-neulo taas niin saat oluen (Finnish) knit again, so that you will get a beer

-Nie fragt sie: ist gefegt? Sie ist gar fein (German) she never asks: has the sweeping been done? She is very refined
-in girum imus nocte et consumimur igni (Latin) we enter the circle after dark and are consumed by fire
-nipson anomemata me monan opsin (Ancient Greek) wash (off) my sins, not only my face (written on the edge of a well in Constantinople: NB the ‘ps’ is a transcription of the Greek letter ψ)

The Finns have three of the world’s longest palindromic words:

-saippuakivikauppias a soapstone seller
-saippuakuppinippukauppia a soap-cup trader
-solutomaattimittaaamotulos the result from a measurement laboratory for tomatoes Getting Around

dalu tongtian, ge zou yi bian (Chinese) the highway comes out of one’s mouth

Thumbing it

Some rides are free:

- fara a puttanu (Icelandic) to hitchhike (literally, to travel on the thumb)
- usqar (Khakas, Siberia) to take someone on the back of one’s horse
- radif (Persian) one who rides behind another on the same horse
- menggonceng (Indonesian) to have a free ride usually on a friend’s bike
- plomo (Spanish, Central America) a bus passenger who is just on for the free ride (literally, a lead weight)

Others involve money …

- ngetem (Indonesian) to stop (of a bus) longer than necessary at unauthorized points along the route to the terminus to look for more paying passengers
- ngojek (Indonesian) to earn money by carrying a paying passenger on the rear seat of one’s motorbike

… or getting your own transport:

- essoreuse (French) a noisy motorbike (literally, spin dryer)
- Warmwassergeige (German) a souped-up motorcycle (literally, warm-water violin)
- teplushka (Russian) a heated goods van used for carrying people
- bottom-bottom wata wata (African Creole) a submarine
- gung gung chi chuh (Chinese) a bus
- vokzal (Russian) a railway station (named after Vauxhall in London)
- voiture-balai (French) the last train or bus (literally, broom-vehicle as it sweeps up the latecomers)

Set of wheels

One particular form of transport is pre-eminent in the modern world: whether normal, or convertible (spider in Italian), or vintage (oldtimer in German). What lets most cars down, however, are the people driving them, be it the viande paraguero (Caribbean Spanish), the Sunday driver (literally, an umbrella stand); or the Gurtmuffel (German), someone who doesn’t wear a seat belt. Then, of course, there’s the way people drive:

- sgasata (Italian) a sudden and violent acceleration
- appuyer sur le champignon (French) to put one’s foot down (literally, to stamp on the mushroom)
- Geisterfahrer (German), a person driving on the wrong side of the road

Road rage

Hazards are all too common, whether in the car …

- desgomarse (Caribbean Spanish) to have bad tyres
- ulykkesbilen (Danish) an ill-fated car
- Blechlawine (German) a huge traffic jam (literally, a sheet-metal avalanche)
- matadero (Spanish, Central America) a car scrapheap (literally, a slaughterhouse)

… or out of it. The French have the most evocative expressions to describe both the reckless pedestrian – viande à pneux, meat for tyres, and the knock suffered by a cyclist – l’homme au marteau, literally, the man with the hammer.

Apache cars

The Apache people of the USA name the parts of cars to correspond to parts of the body. The front bumper is daw, the chin or jaw; the front fender is wos, the shoulder; the rear fender is gun, the arm and hand; the chassis is chun, the back; the rear wheel is ke, the foot. The mouth is ze, the petrol-pipe opening. The nose is chee, the bonnet. The eyes areinda, the headlights. The forehead is ta, the roof.

The metaphorical naming continues inside. The car’s electrical wiring is tsaws, the veins. The battery is zik, the liver. The petrol tank is pit, the stomach. The radiator is jisoleh, the lung; and its hose, chih, the intestine. The distributor is jih, the heart.

False friends

- punk (Japanese) flat tyre
- chariot (French) trolley
- rower (Polish) bicycle
- fly (Danish) aeroplane

- escape (Portuguese) car exhaust or gas leak
- arrear (Spanish) to drive on
- jam (Mongolian) road

Running on time
The Japanese have some fine vocabulary for trains: gaton gaton is an electric train; gotongoton describes trains rattling along; shoo shoo po po is the sound of a steam train; while kang kang kang is the noise of the level crossing. Kakekomi-josha describes all too vividly rushing onto a train to beat the closing doors, a common sight on Tokyo’s underground.

On reflection

Separatist

Many of the languages around the world are interrelated (for example, Spanish, French and Italian are all Latin languages), but by contrast, ‘isolate languages’ are those that do not appear to be related to any other at all. Some languages became isolate in historical times, after all their known relatives became extinct; the Piraha language, for example, spoken along a tributary of the Amazon, is the last surviving member of the Mura family of languages. Similar isolates include Burushaski, which is spoken in two Himalayan valleys; the Gilyak and Ket languages of Siberia; and Nivkh, a Mongolian language.

The Basque language Euskara is perplexing. It bears no resemblance at all to the languages of its surrounding countries. Some similarities with Georgian have made linguists think it could be related to languages from the Caucasus. Others have tried to relate it to non-Arabic languages from the north of Africa. A more likely hypothesis argues that Euskara developed where it is still spoken and has always been the language of the Basques, who were gradually surrounded by people speaking other unrelated languages.
It Takes All Sorts

gading yang tak retak (Indonesian) there is no ivory that isn’t cracked

Tolerant

When it comes to personality, some people seem to have been put on the planet to make life easier for everyone else:

- cooperar (Spanish, Central America) to go along willingly with someone else to one’s own disadvantage
- abbozzare (Italian) to accept meekly a far from satisfactory situation
- ilunga (Tshiluba, Congo) someone who is ready to forgive any abuse the first time, to tolerate it a second time, but never a third time

Flattering

Others take things too far:

- vasiliner (French) to flatter (literally, to apply vaseline)
- happobijin (Japanese) a beauty to all eight directions (a sycophant)
- Radfahrer (German) one who flatters superiors and browbeats subordinates (literally, a cyclist)

Fawning

The Japanese have the most vivid description for hangers-on: kingyo no funi. It literally means ‘goldfish crap’ – a reference to the way that a fish that has defecated often trails excrement behind it for some time.

Egotists

Sweet-talking others is one thing; massaging your own ego can be another altogether:

- echarse flores (Spanish) to blow your own trumpet (literally, to throw flowers to yourself)
- il ne se mouche pas du pied (French) he has airs above his station (literally, he doesn’t wipe his nose with his foot)
- yi luan tou shi (Chinese) courting disaster by immoderately overestimating one’s own strength (literally, to throw an egg against a rock)
- tirer la couverture à soi (French) to take the lion’s share, all the credit (literally, to pull the blanket towards oneself)

The awkward squad

But there are worse horrors than the merely conceited:
• ataoso (Spanish, Central America) one who sees problems with everything
• kibitzer (Yiddish) one who interferes with unwanted advice
• nedovtipa (Czech) one who finds it difficult to take a hint
• neko-neko (Indonesian) to have a creative idea which only makes things worse
• mukzib (Persian) one who eggs on or compels another to tell a lie
• iant (Serbian) an attitude of proud defiance, stubbornness and self-preservation, sometimes to the detriment of everyone else – or even oneself
• er gibt seinen Senf dazu (German) one who always has something to say even if no one else cares (literally, he brings his mustard along)

Pariah

Some people are able to tough it out whatever happens, imposing their faults on others till the day they die. Others are more sensitive:

• scrostarsi (Italian) to remove oneself as if one were a scab (to move or go away because one’s presence is not desired)
• ulaia (Hawaiian) to live as a hermit because of disappointment
• panaphelika (Ancient Greek) to be deprived of all playmates

Lazybones

Others like to spend time alone for altogether different reasons:

• kopuhia (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) someone who disappears instead of dedicating himself to his work
• linti (Persian) someone who idles his day away lying under a tree
• nubie yam (Waali, Ghana) a farmer who points to his farm but does little more (literally, finger farm)
• gober les mouches (French) to stand by idly (literally, to gulp down flies)
• zamzama (Arabic) to waft along in a relaxed style
• goyang kaki (Indonesian) relaxing and enjoying oneself as problems are sorted out by others (literally, to swing one’s legs)
• kalincak-kelincok (Balinese, Indonesia) the back and forth, here and there or up and down of genuine drifting

Otherwise engaged

Some take idleness to another level:

• luftmensch (Yiddish) an impractical dreamer having no definite business or income
• viajou na maionese (Portuguese) to live in a dream world (literally, to travel in the mayonnaise)
• nglayap (Indonesian) to wander far from home with no particular purpose
• umudrovat se (Czech) to philosophize oneself into the madhouse

Situation vacant

Given that many outsiders think of the Japanese as a nation of workaholics, the language has an unusual number of verbs to describe different states of idleness: boketto is to gaze vacantly into space without thinking or doing anything; bosabosa is to sit around idly not doing what needs to be done; gorogoro is to spend time doing nothing (including lolling in a recumbent position); guzuguizu is to vacillate, procrastinate or to stretch out a job; while bura-bura is to wander around aimlessly, looking at the sights with no fixed destination in mind.

Manic obsessive
No one, as far as we know, died of laziness. Frantic activity, however, is another thing …

- Putzfimmel (German) a mania for cleaning
- samlermani (Danish) a mania for collecting
- Grüebelsucht (German) an obsession in which even the simplest facts are compulsively queried
- muwaswas (Arabic) to be obsessed with delusions
- potto (Japanese) to be so distracted or preoccupied that you don’t notice what is happening right in front of you

… and can lead to karoshi (Japanese), death from overwork.

The German mindset

A distinguishing feature of the German language is its creation of evocative concepts by linking different words together, useful for depicting not just characters but states of mind. Most of us know Schadenfreude (literally, damage joy), which describes what we hardly dare express: that feeling of malicious pleasure in someone else’s misfortune. But there are numerous others. We’ve all had a boss who’s suffered from Betriebsblindheit: organizational blindness; and who has not worked alongside someone who is fisselig: flustered to the point of incompetence? That very same person could be described as a Korinthenkacker: one who is overly concerned with trivial details.

False friends

- fatal (German) annoying
- hardnekkig (Dutch) stubborn
- lawman (Aukan, Suriname) crazy person
- estúpido (Portuguese) rude
- morbido (Italian) soft, tender
- xerox (French) unoriginal or robotic individual
- extravagans (Hungarian) eccentric
- konsekvent (Swedish) consistent

Fools and rogues

There’s a rich stream of invective running through the world’s languages when it comes to people we regard as less intelligent than ourselves. The Cantonese equivalent to ‘you’re as thick as two short planks’ is the equally graphic nie hochi yat gau faan gam, ‘you look like a clump of cooked rice’, while the German equivalent to ‘not quite all there’ is nicht alle Tassen im Schrank haben, ‘not to have all the cups in the cupboard’ (not to have all one’s marbles).
Meanwhile the Maoris of the Cook Islands have the telling word varevare, which means ‘to be very young and still quite hopeless’.

Schlumps and schleppers

When it comes to insults, few languages can compete with Yiddish. In this wonderfully evocative language, a fool can be not just a shmutter or a schlump but a nar, a tam, a tipesh, a bulvan, a shoyte, a peysi, a kuni lemel, a lekish, or even a shmenge.

Not content with these, the language gets more specific. A loser is a schlepper, a shmugeggeshnorrer, a paskudnik, a fisher, a yold or even a no-goodnik. A klutz is a clumsy, oafish bungler and a lekish ber schlemiel is a fool without luck. A fool who is not just stupid but inept is a schlimazl. A farshpiler is one who has lost all his money gambling. The saddest of all is perhaps the nisrof, the burnt-out fool.

Other fine insults in Yiddish have included:

- nebbish a nobody
- nudnick a yakky, aggressively boring person
- putz a simpleton
- shlub a clumsy and ill-mannered person
- shmegegge a foolish person and a sycophant
- shmendrick a timid nonentity
- shnook a nice but pathetic gullible person

All talk

Worse than the fool is one of those people who occur in every organization on the planet: the buchipluma (Caribbean Spanish), the person who promises but doesn’t deliver. The same language has a useful verb for the way such people behave: culipaneer, which means to look for excuses for not meeting obligations.

Fibbers

Even the infuriating buchipluma is surely preferable to the outright liar. And, as Japanese vividly shows, from lying to someone (nimaijita o tsukau, to use two tongues), it’s just a small step to duping (hanage o nuku handy, literally, to pull the hair out of their nostrils) or doublecrossing them (negaeri o utsu, literally, to roll them over while sleeping).

Salt of the earth

What a shame that we can’t all be uncomplicatedly good: for example, when you’re acting with meraki (a Greek word) you’re doing something with soul, creativity or love, and putting something of yourself into what you’re doing:

- tubli (Estonian) orderly, strong, capable, hard-working, persistent, productive, setting an example to others, behaving properly or having will power
- ondinnonk (Iroquoian, USA) the soul’s innermost benevolent desires or the angelic parts of human nature

Indonesian two in one

Indonesian has many words that combine two aspects of character or appearance into a single simple word. So you might well know someone who is ricuh, that is, chaotic and noisy; pandir, stupid, but innocent and honest; mungil, tiny and pretty; merana, lonely and miserable; lencir, slim and tall; bangkot, old and cantankerous; or klimis, smooth and shiny.

Tall poppies

Sweden is a country that not only values the concept of a lack of extremes but even has a word for it – lagom. In this society, it’s generally not thought to be good to stand out too much. Everything and everyone is supposed to be just lagom – which is not to say ‘boring’, so much as ‘not too much and not too little’, ‘not good and not bad’, ‘okay’, ‘just right’, ‘so-so’.

So so similar

The concept of ‘so-so’ is found in many languages, and often in a similarly repetitive form: it’s tako tako in Bosnian/Croatian/Serbian, aixi aixi in Catalan, cosi cosi in Italian, wale wale in Chipewyan (Canada), hanter hanter in Cornish, thik thik in Gujarati (India), hai hao in Mandarin, jako tako in Polish, ithin ithin in Sinhala (Sri Lanka), soyle boyle in Turkish, etsi ketsi in Greek, atal atal in Occitan (France), asina asina in Asturian (Spain), elae belae in Azeri (Azerbaijan) and azoy azoy in Yiddish.

Happy talk

Good or bad, modest or conceited, hard-working or lazy, all of us experience the highs of emotion:

- tout baigne dans l’huile (French) hunky-dory (literally, everything is bathing in oil)
- ai bu shishou (Chinese) so delighted with something that one can scarcely take one’s eyes off it
- ichigo-ichie (Japanese) the practice of treasuring each moment and trying to make it perfect
- pulaka (Tulu, India) hair that stands on end with ecstasy
- bas-bhualadh (Scottish Gaelic) clapping one’s hands from joy or grief
- tuman (Indonesian) to find something enjoyable and want to have it again
- mubshar (Persian) to be exhilarated with good news
- zhuxing (Chinese) to add to the fun

Side-splitting

- sekaseka (Bemba, Congo and Zambia) to laugh without reason
- tergelak (Malay) laughing unintentionally
- katahara itai (Japanese) laughing so much that one side of your abdomen hurts

Enraptured

The Japanese have particularly wonderful words for the deep joy that can come as a response to beauty: uttori is to be enraptured by the loveliness of something; aware describes the feelings created by ephemeral beauty; yoin is the reverberating sensation after the initial stimulus has ceased; while yugen goes further, describing an awareness of the universe that triggers feelings too deep and mysterious for words.

Down in the dumps

The causes of unhappiness are many, varied and not always easy to put your finger on:

- termangu-mangu (Indonesian) sad and not sure what to do
- mono-no-aware (Japanese) appreciating the sadness of existence
- avoir le cafard (French) to be down in the dumps (literally, to have the cockroach)

- litost (Czech) the state of torment created by the sudden realization of one’s own misery
- kusat’ sebe lokti (Russian) to cry over spilt milk (literally, to bite one’s elbows)
- emakou (Gilbertese, Kiribati) a secret sorrow
- bel hevi (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) the heavy sinking feeling that often accompanies extreme sadness (literally, belly heavy)

Weltschmerz

Weltschmerz is another untranslatable German word. It broadly means world-weariness, but carries with it both a sense of sorrow at the evils of the world and a yearning for something better. Aspects of it can be found in the Welsh hiraeth, a mingled feeling of sadness, somewhere between homesickness and nostalgia, and the Portuguese saudade, the longing for things that were or might have been. Nostalgia also lies at the heart of the Brazilian Portuguese word banzo, which describes a slave’s profound longing for his African homeland.

In the slough of despond

There are various ways to deal with feelings of despair. Either you can take a philosophical view and try to avoid the Persian concept of sanud, that is, the exercise of the mind upon an unprofitable subject; or you can adopt the defeatist attitude inherent in the Indonesian word jera, which means ‘so scared by a past experience that one will never want to do it again’. Or you can take refuge in Kummerspeck, a German word that describes the excess weight you will gain from emotion-related overeating (literally, grief bacon).

Seeing red

Therapists would suggest it’s better out than in:

- mukamuka (Japanese) feeling so angry one feels like throwing up
- geragas (Malay) to comb one’s hair in anger
- feau (Samoan) to recall good deeds done when one is angry
Survival instincts

Even though some languages are vanishing, in a world less hospitable to aboriginal peoples and more swamped by English, this does not mean it’s impossible to keep endangered languages alive. Mohawk, for instance, spoken by indigenous groups in Quebec, was in retreat until the 1970s, when it was first codified and then taught to children in schools. Welsh and Maori have both made a comeback with concerted official help; and Navajo (USA), Hawaiian and several languages spoken in remote parts of Botswana have been artificially revived.

Iceland has managed to keep alive its native tongue, even though it is spoken by no more than 275,000 people; and the ancient Nordic language of Faroese, thought to have been once spoken by the Vikings, was preserved from extinction by the Danish government, who even went as far as putting grammar hints and verb declensions on the sides of milk cartons.

A powerful political purpose is another force forreviving an old language. Resurgent nationalism helped bring Irish back from the Celtic twilight; while the establishment of the nation of Israel has turned Hebrew from a written language into a proudly spoken national tongue.
Falling in Love

nam gawa the wei woe lu yoe; phung dang si yang they nang yoe (Dzongkha, Bhutan) fun and pleasure are located below the navel; dispute and trouble are also found there

The language of love

In English the language of love is, metaphorically speaking, a violent and disorientating one: we fall in love, are love struck and struggle to avoid heartbreak. It seems things are the same throughout the world:

- harawata o tatsu (Japanese) to break one’s heart (literally, to sever one’s intestines)
- coup de foudre (French) love at first sight (literally, a flash of lightning)
- mune o kogasu (Japanese) to pine away (literally, to scorch one’s chest)
- tragado como media de cartero (Colombian Spanish) being hopelessly in love (literally, swallowed like a postman’s sock)

The rules of attraction …

Physical beauty is often the starting point for love:

- pichón (Caribbean Spanish) a handsome young man (literally, young pigeon)

- qiubo (Chinese) the bright and clear eyes of a beautiful woman
- mahj (Persian) looking beautiful after a disease
- avoir la frite (French) to be in great shape (literally, to have the French fry)
- magandang hinaharap (Tagalog, Philippines) nice breasts (literally, nice future)
- dayadrsti (Hindi) compassionate eyes
- kemayu (Indonesian) to act like a beauty

Sometimes the basic materials need a little assistance:
slampadato (Italian) a person who gets tanned with an infrared lamp zhengrong (Chinese) to tidy oneself up or to improve one’s looks by plastic surgery

… and of repulsion

The Japanese have a particular word for a situation in which attraction is all too brief. Bakku-shan is a girl who appears pretty when seen from behind but not from the front.

Would like to meet

English is somewhat deficient in words that describe the very early moments of attraction. We need a word like mamihlapinatapai, from the Fuegian language found in Chile, meaning that shared look of longing where both parties know the score yet neither is willing to make the first move. Other, more active approaches include:

- basabasa (Arabic) to ogle, make sheep’s eyes, cast amorous glances
- piropo (Spanish) a compliment paid on the street (which ranges from polite to raunchy)
- xiyyet (Dardja, Algeria) he is sewing (this is said of someone who is trying to win over a girl, especially by talking)

- pulir hebillas (Spanish, Central America) to polish belt buckles (to dance very closely)

The direct approach

The Italians are masters at taking matters to the next level: pomicione is a man who seeks any chance of being in close physical contact with a woman; puntare is to stare intensely at the one to whom one feels sexually attracted; while tirino is the sound made by smacking one’s lips together like a loud kiss to indicate attraction. Sometimes a boy will say cibi cierre to a girl (CBCR). This is an acronym of cresci bene che ripasso: ‘if you still look like that when you’ve grown up, I will come and pay you a call’ …

Dîner à un

… while the French have perfected the art of rejection:

- poser un lapin à quelqu’un to stand someone up (literally, to lay a rabbit on someone)
- Saint-Glinglin a date that is put off indefinitely (jusqu’à la Saint-Glinglin means never in a month of Sundays)

Japanese dating

Rainen no kono hi mo issho ni waratteiyoh is one of the country’s most successful chat-up lines; it means ‘this time next year let’s be laughing together’.
Commitment-phobe

The romantic ideal is Einfühlungsvermögen, the German word for an understanding so intimate that the feelings, thoughts and motives of one person are readily comprehended by the other; but the route to that happy state can so often be confused by the insincere:

- biodegradabile (Italian) someone who falls in love easily and often
- capkinlasmak (Turkish) to turn into a skirt chaser
- leonera (Spanish, Central America) a bachelor pad (literally, a lion’s den)
- vieux marcheur (French) an elderly man who still chases women (literally, an old campaigner)

False friends

- nob (Wolof, Gambia and Senegal) to love
- city (Czech) feelings
- dating (Chinese) to ask about, enquire
- baron (French) sugar daddy
- agony (Rasta Patois) sensations felt during sex
- bonk (Afrikaans) lump or thump
- song (Vietnamese) to live life

Affairs of the heart

When things can go so sweetly …

- alamnaka (Ulwa, Nicaragua) to find one’s niche, to meet a kindred soul
- pelar la pava (Caribbean Spanish) to be alone romancing one’s sweetheart (literally, to pluck a female turkey)
- andare in camporella (Italian) to go into a secluded spot in the countryside to make love
- hiza o majieru (Japanese) to have an intimate talk (literally, to mingle each other’s knees)
- queesting (Dutch) allowing a lover access to one’s bed under the covers for chit-chat
- ghalidan (Persian) to move from side to side as lovers, to roll, wallow or tumble

… how can they be so bitter at the end?

- aki ga tatsu (Japanese) a mutual cooling of love (literally, the autumn breeze begins to blow)
- razblyuto (Russian) the feeling for someone once but no longer loved
- dejar con el paquete (Spanish) abandoning a woman one has made pregnant (literally, to drop with the parcel)
- plaquê (French) dumped (literally, laid flat or rugby-tackled)
- cavoli riscaldati (Italian) an attempt to revive a lapsed love affair (literally, reheated cabbage)

Reality check

The Boro people of India have a sophisticated understanding of the complexities of loving: onsay means to pretend to love; ongubsy means to love deeply, from the heart; and onsia signifies loving for the very last time.

Love for sale

Who better than the pragmatic French to construct a precise terminology for love as a business, ranging from a passe raide, the basic price for a sex session, to the kangourou, a prospective client who hesitates (hops around) before deciding on a girl. When it comes to those who ply their trade, there are many equally specific terms. An escaladeuse de braguette is, literally a zipper climber; a beguineuse is an unreliable prostitute; a wagonnière is a woman who solicits on trains; a truqueur means a rentboy who blackmails his clients; while a cocotte-minute is a pro who turns many tricks very quickly (literally, a pressure cooker). There is even an expression, commencer à rendre la monnaie, to show signs of age, which is said of prostitutes who in better days didn’t have to give change for large notes.

Let’s talk about sex

The Mosuo people in China have three sacred taboos: it’s forbidden to eat dog, to eat cat and to talk about sex. The latter taboo doesn’t seem to apply elsewhere:

- avoir la moule qui bâille (French) to be horny (literally, to have a yawning mussel)
- menggerumut (Indonesian) to approach somebody quietly in the night for sex
- jalishgar (Persian) to be addicted to sexual intercourse
- carezza (Italian) sexual intercourse in which ejaculation is avoided (literally, caressing or petting)

Penis dialogues

There are many ways to describe le petit chauve au col roulé (French), the little baldy in a turtleneck, and the respect with which he’s treated:

- narachastra prayoga (Sanskrit) men who worship their own sexual organ
- enfundarla (Spanish) to put one’s penis back in one’s pants (or one’s sword back in its sheath)
- zakilpista (Basque) a sufferer from premature ejaculation (literally, pistol prick)
- koro (Japanese) the hysterical belief that one’s penis is shrinking into one’s body
- camisa-de-venus (Brazilian Portuguese) a condom (literally, shirt of Venus)

The Tagalog speakers of the Philippines take things further with the batuta ni Drakula (‘Dracula’s nightstick’). Added sexual pleasure can be gained from pilik-mata ng kambing (goat’s eyelashes) or bulitas (small plastic balls surgically implanted to enlarge the penises of young Filipinos).

Sex for one …

The vocabulary is no less specialized when it comes to what the Italians describe as assolo, a solo performance. Up-retiree-hue (Rapa Nui, Easter Islands) is to touch one’s penis with the intention of masturbating, while the Japanese have several graphic terms for the experience. Male masturbation is referred to as senzuri (a thousand rubs), with the added refinement of masu-kagami (masturbating in front of a mirror). Female masturbation, by contrast, is described as shiko shiko manzuri (ten thousand rubs) and suichi o ireru (flicking the switch).

… and for many

Similar sensations can be experienced in company:

- partousard (French) a participator in group sex
- movimento (Italian) a circle of acquaintances who are actual or potential sexual partners
- agapemone (Greek) an establishment where free love is practised
- sacanagem (Brazilian Portuguese) the practice of openly seeking sexual pleasure with one or more partners other than one’s primary partner (during Mardi Gras)

Pacific holiday
On the islands of Ulithi in the Western Pacific, the Micronesian people like to take a holiday from their regular lovemaking. Pi supuhui (literally, a hundred pettings) describes a holiday dedicated to mate-swapping. People pair up and go into the woods to share a picnic and make love. Married couples are not allowed to go together and the selection of new partners is encouraged. If there is an unequal number of participants, some couples may become threesomes.

The desired result or the result of desire

The French have a charming expression for this: voir les anges, which means to see angels.

On reflection

Thumbs up

Gestures should be used carefully when abroad for fear of misunderstandings. The cheery thumbs-up used by the English or Americans means ‘up yours’ in the Middle East and ‘sit on this’ in Sardinia. In France, pressing a thumb against the fingertips means something is ooh-la-la parfait or just right, while in Egypt, the same gesture means ‘stop right there’.

An American’s sign for ‘okay’, made by touching the tip of the thumb to the tip of the forefinger, and used internationally by scuba divers, is an insult in Brazil. In some countries, the V sign can be negative, in others positive; in Italy, reversed, it approximates to ‘to hell with you’. In some countries, flicking your thumb across the teeth tells the other person he’s a cheapskate. Just about everywhere grabbing the crook of your elbow and raising your fist is rude. In the Arab world, the middle finger pointed downwards and moving up and down, with the palm horizontal, equates to a raised middle finger in England.
bu yin, bu long, bu cheng gu gong (Chinese) unless one pretends to be stupid or deaf it is difficult to be a mother-in-law or father-in-law

Getting hitched
There comes a point, in most societies, where a relationship is formalized in law. As the Romanians say: dragostea e oarbă, dar căsătoria îi găsește leacul, love is blind, but marriage finds a cure:

- strga (Bulgarian) a survey or visit to the home of a prospective bride
- kumoru alweik (Khowar, Pakistan) to lure a girl into marriage
- lobola (Manu Bantu, Zaire) the bride price (which is usually paid in cattle)
- casarse de penalti (Spanish) to get married after discovering a pregnancy
- dar el braguetazo (Spanish) the marriage of a poor man to a rich woman
- skeinkjari (Faroese, Denmark) the man who goes among wedding guests offering them alcohol (‘that popular chap’)

Trouble and strife
Does one always live happily ever after? The evidence of our global languages suggests that it’s not always the case:

- desortijarse (Caribbean Spanish) to return the engagement ring
- kotsuniku no araso (Japanese) domestic strife (literally, the fight between bones and flesh)
- ava (Tahitian) wife (but it also means whisky)

- pelotilla (Caribbean Spanish) argument among spouses
- ainolektros (Ancient Greek) fatally wedded
- talik (Malay) to marry with the stipulation of automatic divorce for a husband’s desertion
- rujuk (Indonesian) to remarry the wife you’ve already divorced

Yang

Sometimes, the man is clearly to blame when things go wrong (with the emphasis on infidelity, desertion and gambling):

- pu’ukaula (Hawaiian) to set up one’s wife as a stake in gambling
- qum’us (Persian) one who pimps his own wife
- talak (Arabic) a husband who frees himself from his wife
- agunah (Hebrew) a woman whose husband has deserted her or has disappeared and who is restrained from remarrying until she shows a bill of divorce or proof of his death
- bawusni (Persian) a wife whose husband does not love her and seldom visits

Yin

At other times the fault lies with the woman (with the emphasis on laziness, bullying and antipathy):

- farik (Persian) a woman who hates her husband
- jefa (Caribbean Spanish) a domineering wife
- shiri ni shikareru (Japanese) a husband who is under his wife’s thumb (literally, under her buttocks)
- polohana’ole (Hawaiian) a woman who refuses to work but lives on her husband’s earnings
- baulero (Caribbean Spanish) a henpecked husband who cannot go out alone
- purik (Indonesian) to return to one’s parents’ home as a protest against one’s husband

Family matters

Once married, man and wife may find that their greatest problem is getting enough time alone. Extending the family can work both ways:

- bol (Mayan, Mexico) foolish in-laws
- sitike (Apache, USA) in-laws who are formally committed to help during crises
- todamane (Tulu, India) entertaining a son-in-law or mother-in-law for the first time
- bruja (Spanish, South America) a mother-in-law (literally, a witch)
- biras (Malay) the relationship between two brothers’ wives or two sisters’ husbands

Chercher la femme?

When it comes to the family unit being threatened, why is there is no such thing as an homme fatal? Caribbean Spanish differentiates between a woman who prefers married men (comadreja, literally, a weasel) and one who lures them into extramarital relationships (ciegamachos). Can it really be that women are more predatory than men? Or is it that by luridly painting women as lustful (aa’amo in Hawaiian means ‘an insatiable woman’) and conniving (alghunjar is Persian for the feigned anger of a mistress), men the world over have cleverly avoided any blame for their own adulterous behaviour? Even when they’re guilty, they try to keep the linguistic upper hand, if the German word Drachenfutter is anything to go by. Literally translated as ‘dragon fodder’ it describes the peace offerings that guilty husbands offer their spouses.

One cure for adultery
Rhaphanidosis was a punishment meted out to adulterous men by cuckolded husbands in Ancient Greece. It involved inserting a radish up their backside.

An avuncular solution

The Western ideal of a monogamous husband and wife is not universal. There is, for example, no word for father in Mosuo (China). The nearest translation for a male parental figure is axia, which means friend or lover; and while a child will have only one mother, he or she might have a sequence of axia. An axia has a series of nighttime trysts with a woman, after which he returns home to his mother. Any children resulting from these liaisons are raised in the woman’s household. There are no fathers, husbands or marriages in Mosuo society. Brothers take care of their sisters’ children and act as their fathers. Brothers and sisters live together all their lives in their mothers’ homes.

Polygamy on ice

Other societies replace the complexities of monogamy with those of polygamy, as, for example, the Inuit of the Arctic:

- angutawkun a man who exchanges wives with another man or one of the men who have at different times been married to the same woman
- areodjarekput to exchange wives for a few days only, allowing a man sexual rights to his woman during that period
- nuliiunaroak sharing the same woman; more specifically, the relationship between a man and his wife’s lover when the husband has not consented to the arrangement

False friends

dad (Albanian) wet nurse or babysitter babe (SiSwati, Swaziland) father or minister mama (Georgian) father brat (Russian) brother parents (Portuguese) relatives loo (Fulani, Mali) storage pot bang (Albanian) paper bag sin (Bosnian/Croatian/Serbian) son

Special relations

Whether it’s because they have big families, time on their hands in large empty spaces, or for another reason, the Sami people of Northern Scandinavia have highly specific terms for family members and relationships: goaski are one’s mother’s elder sisters, and sivjot is one’s older sister’s husband; one’s mother’s younger sisters are muotta and one’s father’s younger sisters are siessa; one’s mother’s brothers are eanu and her brothers’ wives are ipmi; one’s brother’s wife is a mangi. The nearby Swedes exhibit a similar subtlety in their terms for grandfathers and grandmothers: farfar is a father’s father, morfar is a mother’s father, farmor is a father’s mother and mormor is a mother’s mother.

This pattern of precise names for individual family members had a parallel in an older society. Latin distinguished patruus (father’s brother) from avunculus (mother’s brother); and matertera (father’s sister) from amita (mother’s sister).

Of even earlier origins, the Australian Kamilaroi nganuwaay means a mother’s cross-cousin’s daughter and also a mother’s father’s sister’s daughter as well as a mother’s mother’s brother’s daughter’s daughter as well as a mother’s mother’s brother’s son’s daughter.
Tahitian taio

Meanwhile, in the warm climate of Tahiti, the word taio (Maohi, French Polynesia) means a formal friendship between people not related by ancestors, which involves the sharing of everything, even sex partners. A taio relationship can be male-to-male, female-to-female or male-to-female.

Essential issue

Language testifies to the importance most cultures attach to having children, as well as the mixed emotions the little darlings bring with them. Yiddish, for example, details both extremes of the parental experience, nakhes being the mixture of pleasure and pride a parent gets from a child, and tsuris the grief and trouble:

- izraf (Persian) producing ingenious, witty children
- niyoga (Hindi) the practice of appointing a woman to bear a male heir who will be conceived by proxy
- menguyl-uyel (Indonesian) to hug, cuddle and tickle someone (usually a child) as an expression of affection
- gosh-pech (Persian) twisting the ears of a schoolboy as a punishment

- abtar (Persian) one who has no offspring; a loser (literally, a bucket without a handle)

Parental ambitions

In contrast with the paternal indulgence of the French fils à papa (a son whose father makes things very easy for him) are some stricter maternal leanings:

- kyoikumama (Japanese) a woman who crams her children to succeed educationally
- ciegayernos (Caribbean Spanish) a woman who looks for a husband for her daughter
- mammismo (Italian) maternal control and interference that continues into adulthood

Home is where the heart is Not everyone lives in a standard box-like house:

- berhane (Turkish) an impractically large mansion, rambling house
- angase (Tulu, India) a building where the front part is used as a shop and the back as a residence
- vidhvasram (Hindi) a home for widows

And rooms have many uses:

- Folterkammer (German) a gym or exercise room (literally, a torture chamber)
- ori (Khakas, Siberia) a hole in a yurt to store potatoes
- tyconna (Anglo-Indian) an Indian basement room where the hottest part of the day is passed in the hottest season of the year

- vomitarium (Latin) a room where a guest threw up in order to empty his stomach for more feasting

Bukumatala

In the Kiriwinian language of New Guinea a bukumatala is a ‘young people’s house’, where adolescents go to stay on reaching puberty. As the main aim is to keep brothers and sisters away from the possibility of incestuous sexual contact close relatives will never stay in the same house. The boys return to the parental home for food and may help with the household work; the girls eat, work and occasionally sleep at home, but will generally spend the night with their adolescent sweethearts in one bukumatala or another.

On reflection

Him b’long Missy Kween

An urgent need to communicate can create a language without native speakers. Pidgin, for example, has developed from English among people with their own native tongues. Fine examples of pidgin expressions in the Tok Pisin language of Papua New Guinea are: liklik box you pull him he cry you push him he cry (an accordion) and bigfella iron walking stick him go bang along topside (a rifle). When the Duke of Edinburgh visits Vanuatu, in the Pacific, he is addressed as oldfella Pili-Pili him b’long Missy Kween, while Prince Charles is Pikinini b’long Kween.
Clocking On

l’argent ne se trouve pas sous le sabot d’un cheval (French) money isn’t found under a horse’s hoof

Tinker, tailor …

The Japanese phrase for ‘making a living’ is yo o wataru, which literally means ‘to walk across the world’, and it’s certainly true that when the chips are down there are some intriguing ways of earning a crust:

- folapostes (Spanish) a worker who climbs telephone or electrical poles
- geshtenjapjeks (Albanian) a street vendor of roast chestnuts
- koshatnik (Russian) a dealer in stolen cats
- dame-pipi (French) a female toilet assistant
- tarriqu-zan (Persian) an officer who clears the road for a prince
- kualanapuhi (Hawaiian) an officer who keeps the flies away from the sleeping king by waving a brush made of feathers
- buz-baz (old Persian) a showman who made a goat and a monkey dance together
- capoclaque (Italian) someone who coordinates a group of clappers
- fyrassistent (Danish) an assistant lighthouse keeper
- cigerci (Turkish) a seller of liver and lungs
- lomilomi (Hawaiian) the masseur of the chief, whose duty it was to take care of his spittle and excrement

The daily grind

Attitudes to work vary not just from workplace to workplace, but from one side of the office to the other:

- fucha (Polish) to use company time and resources for one’s own purposes
- haochi-lanzuo (Chinese) to be fond of food and averse to work
- aviador (Spanish, Central America) a government employee who shows up only on payday
- chupotero (Spanish) a person who works little but has several salaries
- madogiwazoku (Japanese) those who have little to do (literally, window gazers)
- jeito (Brazilian Portuguese) to find a way to get something done, no matter what the obstacles

Métro-boulot-dodo

This cheery French expression describes life in a none-too-optimistic way. Literally translated as ‘tube-work-sleep’ it summarizes the daily grind, hinting strongly that it’s pointless.

Carrot …

Motivation is a key factor, and employers who want maximum productivity find different ways of achieving this:

- Mitbestimmung (German) the policy in industry of involving both workers and management in decision-making
• vydvizhenchestvo (Russian) the system of promotion of workers to positions of responsibility and authority
• kaizen (Japanese) the continuous improvement of working practices and personal efficiency as a business philosophy

… and stick
paukikape (Ancient Greek) the projecting collar worn by slaves while grinding corn in order to prevent them from eating it.

German work ethic

The Germans have long had a reputation for working hard. Inevitably, though, alongside the Urlaubsmuffel, or person who is against taking vacations, there is also the Trittbrettfahrer (literally, running-board rider), the person who profits from another’s work. And along with the studious Technonomade (someone who conducts most of their business on the road, using laptops and mobiles), you will find the less scrupulous schwarzarbeiten (preferring to do work not reported for taxes).

False friends

- biro (Arabic) office
- adman (Arabic) offering better guaranty
- ganga (Spanish) bargain
- mixer (Hungarian) barman
- slug (Gaulish) servant
- fat (Cantonese) prosperity
- hot (Romanian) thief
- baker (Dutch) nurse

The deal

Others have less noble ways of getting ahead:
• zhengquan-duoli (Chinese) to jockey for power and scramble for profit
• jineteer el dinero (Spanish, Central America) to profit by delaying payment
• tadlis (Persian) concealing the faults of goods on sale
• qiang jingtou (Chinese) a fight by a cameraman for a vantage point (literally, stealing the show)

• grilagem (Brazilian Portuguese) the old practice of putting a cricket in a box of newly faked documents, until the moving insect’s excrement makes the papers look plausibly old and genuine (literally, cricketing)

On the take

If sharp practice doesn’t work, then the best thing to do is cast all scruples aside:

• bustarella (Italian) a cash bribe (literally, a little envelope)

• dhurna (Anglo-Indian) extorting payment by sitting at the debtor’s door and staying there without food, threatening violence until your demands are met

• sola (Italian) a swindle in which you don’t share the loot with your accomplice

• sokaiya (Japanese) a blackmailer who has a few shares in a large number of companies and tries to extort money by threatening to cause trouble at the shareholders’ annual general meetings

• TST (Tahu Sama Tahu) (Indonesian) ‘you know it, I know it’: a verbal agreement between two people, one usually a government official, to cheat the state

Hard cash

In the end, it all comes down to one thing:

• lechuga (Caribbean Spanish) a dollar bill (literally, lettuce)

• kapusta (Russian) money (literally, cabbage)

• mahiyana (Persian) monthly wages or fish jelly

• wampum (Algonquian, Canada) strings of beads and polished shells, used as money by native Americans

Spongers

If you don’t have much money yourself, there are always ways around the problem:

• gorrero (Spanish, Central America) a person who always allows others to pay

• piottaro (Italian) one who carries very little cash

• Zechpreller (German) someone who leaves without paying the bill

• dar mico (Caribbean Spanish) to consume without paying

• seigneur-terrasse (French) one who spends much time but little money in a café (literally, a terrace lord)

Neither a borrower nor a lender be

Indonesian has the word pembonceng to describe someone who likes to use other people’s facilities, but the Pascuense language of Easter Island has gone one step further in showing how the truly unscrupulous exploit friends and family. Tingo is to borrow things from a friend’s house, one by one, until there’s nothing left; while hakamaroo is to keep borrowed objects until the owner has to ask for them back.
What is yours is mine

It’s a short step to outright crime:

- mencomot (Indonesian) stealing things of small value such as food or drinks, partly for fun
- baderotte (Danish) a beach thief
- Agobiles (German) burglar’s tools
- ajane (Tulu, India) the noise of a thief
- pukau (Malay) a charm used by burglars to make people fall asleep
- azote de barrio (Spanish, Central America) a criminal who concentrates on a particular neighbourhood
- accordéon (French) an extensive criminal record

A life of crime

Italian offers a rich vocabulary for different types of crime and criminal. Smonta, for example, is a theft carried out on a bus or train from which the perpetrator gets off as soon as possible, while scavalco (literally, climbing over) is a robbery carried out via a window or balcony. A night-time burglary is a serenata (literally, a serenade) which may well involve an orchestra, or gang of thieves, possibly accompanied by a palo, an accomplice who acts as lookout.

Extreme measures

If all else fails one of the following may be necessary:

- nakkeskud (Danish) a shot in the back of the head
- gusa (Japanese) to decapitate with a sword
- rejam (Malay) to execute by pressing into mud

Hiding the evidence

Persian offers a refinement to the crude concept of ‘murder’. The expression war nam nihadan means to kill and then bury someone, growing flowers over the grave in order to conceal it.

Chokey

As most career criminals would agree, the worst downside to a life of crime is getting caught:

- kaush (Albanian) a prison cell or paper bag
- squadretta (Italian) a group of prison guards who specialize in beating up inmates (literally, small squad)
• fangfeng (Chinese) to let prisoners out for exercise or to relieve themselves
• Kassiber (German) a letter smuggled out of jail; a secret coded message
• jieyu (Chinese) to break into jail to rescue a prisoner
• alba (Italian) the day one leaves prison after serving time

On reflection

Executive essentials

Conclusions cannot always be drawn about historical connections. Some words are similar in numerous languages. Much linguistic research has led to the theory of an Ur-language (Indo-European) spoken some fifty thousand years ago, from which most other languages have descended. Papa, for example, is used for ‘father’ in seventy per cent of languages across the world.

Meanwhile, essential latterday vocabulary has crossed languages as easily as the jet-setting executive who uses it:

taxi is recognized in French, German, Swedish, Spanish, Danish, Norwegian, Dutch, Czech, Slovak, Portuguese, Hungarian and Romanian sauna is recognized in Finnish, English, Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, French, German, Dutch, Danish, Lithuanian, Croatian/Bosnian/Serbian, Romanian and Norwegian bank is recognized in Afrikaans, Amharic (Ethiopia), Bengali, Creole, Danish, Dutch, Frisian (Germany and Holland), German, Gujarati (India), Hungarian, Indonesian, Malay, Norwegian, Polish, Sinhala (Sri Lanka), Swedish and Wolof (Senegal and Gambia) hotel is recognized in Afrikaans, Amharic, Asturian (Spain), Bulgarian, Catalan, Croatian/Bosnian/Serbian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, Frisian (Germany and Holland), Galician (Spain), German, Icelandic, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Slovenian, Tswana (Botswana), Ukrainian and Yiddish il giocare non è male, ma è male il perdere (Italian) there is no harm in playing but great harm in losing

Fun and games

Since the start of time the desire to fill it has resulted in a wide range of recreations. Simplest are the games played by children the world over:

- toto (Cook Islands Maori) a shout given in a game of hide-and-seek to show readiness for the search to begin
- pokku (Tulu, India) the throwing of pebbles up in the air and catching them as they fall
- kabaddi (Pakistan) a game where players take it in turn to hold their breath
- bakpi (Ulwa, Nicaragua) a game in which one is swung round in circles until dizzy
- cnapan (Welsh) a game where each side tries to drive a wooden ball as far as possible in one direction
- kula’i wawae (Hawaiian) the pushing of one’s feet against others while seated
- kaengurustyle (Danish) a pogo stick (literally, kangaroo stilt)

Frozen walrus carcass

There are games that are highly specific to their culture and environment, such as the Inuit igunaujananguaq, which literally means frozen walrus carcass. This is a game where the person in the centre tries to remain stiff and is held in place by the feet of the people who are sitting in a circle. He is passed around the ring, hand over hand. Whoever drops him is the next ‘frozen walrus carcass’.

Honing your skills

As we grow up, what we look for in a game becomes increasingly challenging:

- shash-andaz (Persian) someone who tries to juggle with six balls so that four are always in the air
- antyaksari (Hindi) a pastime in which participants recite verses in turn, the first word of each new verse being the same as the last of the preceding one

- kipapa (Hawaiian) to balance on top of a surfboard
- waterponie (Afrikaans) a jet ski
- elastikspring (Danish) bungee jumping

The beautiful game

One game in particular has achieved international pre-eminence, and a range of closely observed terms to describe it:

- armario (Spanish) an awkward or unskilled player (literally, a wardrobe)
- wayra jayt’a (Quechuan, Peru) a poor player (literally, an air kicker)
- cazar (Spanish) to kick one’s opponent and not the ball
- ariete (Spanish) a battering ram (centre forward)
- verkac (Turkish) passing and running
- baile, danze (Spanish) and
- melina (Italian) two players on the same team kicking the ball back and forth to kill time
- roligan (Danish) a non-violent supporter

Taking a punt

Sometimes, fun is not enough; chance or expertise has to be made more exciting by speculation:

- yetu (Tulu, India) gambling in which a coin is tossed and a bet laid as to which side it will fall on
- quiniela (Spanish, USA) a form of betting in which the punter must choose the first and second-place winners in a race, though not necessarily in the correct order
- parani (Cook Islands Maori) to put up a stake at poker without examining one’s cards

The moral perhaps being that it’s better to be the Persian kuz-baz, one who lends money to gamblers, than a mukhtir, one who risks his property in gambling.

Fingers crossed

Some people are born lechero, a Latin American Spanish word for lucky, literally meaning a milkman. Others may be less fortunate:

- smolař (Czech) a person dogged by bad luck
- apes (Indonesian) to have double bad luck
- kualat (Indonesian) to be bound to have bad luck as a result of behaving badly

Break a leg

It’s intriguing that wishing people good luck often takes the form of willing ill fortune on them. The German Hals und Beinbruch, for example, takes the spirit of the English expression ‘break a leg’ and goes one step further – it translates as ‘break your neck and a leg’. The Italians offer an even more gruesome prospect: the cheery wish in bocca al lupo means ‘into the mouth of the wolf’.

The competitive streak

Everyone likes to win, but the methods employed to get ahead range from the inventive to the underhand:
- chupar rueda (Spanish) running or cycling behind another to benefit from reduced wind resistance (literally, to suck wheel)
- kunodesme (Ancient Greek) tying a string round the foreskin to stop the penis getting in the way during athletics (literally, putting the dog on a lead)
- sirind (Persian) entangling legs in wrestling to trip your opponent (also a noose for catching prey by the foot)
- poki (Cook Islands Maori) to deal cards from the bottom of the pack (i.e. unfairly)

False friends

- boghandel (Danish) bookshop
- rain (Arabic) viewer, spectator
- arse (Turkish) violin bow
- jerk (French) praise for an accomplished dancer
- pensel (Swedish) paintbrush
- catch (French) all-in wrestling

Crooning

For those without sporting interest or prowess, entertainment can be found in the realms of music …

- iorram (Scottish Gaelic) a rowing song
- dizlanmak (Turkish) to keep humming to yourself
- Ohrwurm (German) a catchy tune that gets stuck in the brain or rapidly obsesses an entire population (literally, an ear worm)

ngak-ngik-ngok (Indonesian) a derogatory reference to the popularity of rock music in the 1960s (which was much despised by the late President Sukarno)

Twirling

… or of dancing

- raspar canillas (Spanish, Central America) to dance (literally, to scrape shins)
- zapateado (Spanish) the fast footwork and stamping feet used in dancing
- mbuki-mvuki (Bantu, Zaire) to take off one’s clothes in order to dance
- Ball paradox (German) a ball at which women ask men to dance
- verbunkos (Hungarian) a dance performed to persuade people to enlist in the army

Clubbing

The Italians helpfully differentiate between the staff outside and inside a night club: the buttafuori, the one who throws you in, is the person in charge of choosing who gets through the door; while the buttafuori, the one who throws you out, is the bouncer.
Channel surfing

For those who prefer to stay at home, there’s always the television, or Pantoffelkino (slippers cinema), as it’s described in German. The Romani language of the Gypsies takes a rather sterner view, regarding it as a dinnilos-dicking-muktar, or fool’s looking-box. Those with extra channels seem to be viewed as a cut-above in France, where cablé has now acquired the secondary sense of ‘hip and trendy’.

Hi-tech

Having invented numerous machines to give us free time, we now struggle to come up with others to help fill it:

- tamagotchi (Japanese) a lovable egg (an electronic device which copies the demands for food or attention of a pet)
- khali khukweni (Zulu) a mobile phone (literally, to make a noise in the pocket)
- dingdong (Indonesian) computer games in an arcade
- toelva (Icelandic) a computer (formed from the words for digit and prophetess)
- xiaoxia (Chinese) small lobsters (new internet users)

The arts

There are some pastimes that are elevated, by their practitioners and admirers, onto an altogether higher plane:

- sprezzatura (Italian) the effortless technique of a great artist
- wabi (Japanese) a flawed detail that enhances the elegance of the whole work of art
- ostranenie (Russian) the process by which art makes familiar perceptions seem strange
- Verfremdungseffekt (German) a dramatic technique that encourages the audience to preserve a sense of critical detachment from a play (literally, an alienating effect)

Philistines

Those who aren’t impressed by artistic claims have coined a different vocabulary:

- megillah (Yiddish) an unnecessarily long and tiresome story or letter
- de pacotilla (Spanish) a third-rate writer or actor

Rolling up

In our health-conscious world, can smoking still be regarded as recreation?

- segatura (Italian) a cigarette made by mixing cigarette butts (literally, sawdust)
- bakwe (Kapampangan, Philippines) to smoke a cigarette with the lit end in the mouth
- nakurit’sya (Russian) to smoke to one’s heart’s content
- zakurit’sya (Russian) to make oneself ill by excessive smoking

On reflection

Married in a brothel

Some words must remain a mystery to all except native speakers. You would have had to have lived in these places for quite a while to understand how to use correctly some of the following, which in their simply translated definitions contain what seem to us contradictory meanings:
hay kulu (Zarma, Nigeria) anything, nothing and also everything irpadake (Tulu, India) ripe and unripe sitoshna (Tulu, India) cold and hot merrippen (Romani, Gypsy) life and death gift (Norwegian) poison and married magazinshchik (Russian) a shopkeeper and a shoplifter danh t (Vietnamese) a church and a brothel aloha (Hawaiian) hello and goodbye (the word has many other meanings including love, compassion, welcome and good wishes)
Eating and Drinking

olcsó húsnak híg a leve (Hungarian) cheap meat produces thin gravy

Hunting, shooting …

In many parts of the world putting together a meal isn’t always simply a matter of making a quick trip to the local supermarket:

- ortektes (Khakas, Siberia) to hunt together for ducks
- geragai (Malay) a hook for catching crocodiles
- sumpit (Malay) to shoot with a blowpipe
- tu’utu’u (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) to hit the mark time and again (shooting with arrows)
- ajawy (Wayampi, Brazil) to hit the wrong target

… and fishing

Fishing can be equally labour-intensive:

- ta’iti (Cook Islands Maori) to catch fish by encircling a rock with a net and frightening them out
- kapau'u (Hawaiian) to drive fish into a waiting net by splashing or striking the water with a leafy branch
- lihnaka inska wauhwaia (Ulwa, Nicaragua) to slap the water and cause the fish to jump into a boat
- nono (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) fish thrown onto the beach by the waves or which jump out of the water into a boat
- kusyad (Persian) hard black stone thrown into the water to attract fish
- fiskevaer (Norwegian) good weather for fishing
- ah chamseyah chay (Chorti, Guatemala) someone who fishes with dynamite
- pau heoheo (Hawaiian) a person who returns from fishing without any fish

Global gastronomy

When it comes to the extraordinary things that people around the world enjoy putting in their mouths, it’s certainly true that one man’s meat is another man’s poison:

- ptsha (Yiddish) cow’s feet in jelly
• poronkieli (Finnish) reindeer tongue
• kokorec (Turkish) roasted sheep’s intestines
• nama-uni (Japanese) raw sea urchin
• Beuschel (German) stewed calves’ lungs
• acitron (Mexican Spanish) candied cactus
• somad (Sherpa, Nepal) cheese that is old and smelly
• calimocho (Spanish) a combination of Coca-Cola and red wine
• Gummiadler (German) tough roast chicken (literally, rubber eagle)
• marilopotes (Ancient Greek) a gulper of coal dust
• ampo (Malay) edible earth

Menu envy

In some cases, though, it’s the unfamiliar word rather than the food itself that may alarm the outsider:

• flab (Gaelic) a mushroom
• moron (Welsh) a carrot
• aardappel (Dutch) a potato (literally, earth apple)
• bikini (Spanish) a toasted ham and cheese sandwich
• gureepufuruutsu (Japanese) a grapefruit

Can’t cook …

We all know the benefits of lumur (Malay), smearing ingredients with fat during cooking. But even that doesn’t always prevent kanzo (Hausa, Nigeria), burnt food stuck to the bottom of the pot. Perhaps it would help to know the right moment for nisar-qarat (Persian), cold water poured into a pot to stop it getting burnt. The only failsafe way of escaping this is to buy your food boli boli (Aukan, Suriname) – already cooked.

Bon appetit

Now we’re ready to eat …

• protintheuo (Ancient Greek) to pick out the dainty bits beforehand, to help oneself first
• muka (Hawaiian) a smacking sound with the lips, indicating that the food is tasty
• pakupaku (Japanese) to eat in big mouthfuls or take quick bites
• parmaklamak (Turkish) to eat with one’s fingers
• sikkiwok (Inuit) to drink with your chin in the water
• nusarat (Persian) crumbs falling from a table which are picked up and eaten as an act of piety
Boring food

The Japanese are emphatic about how dull food can be: suna o kamu yo na means ‘like chewing sand’. They even have an evocative term for rehashed food: nibansenji, meaning ‘brewing tea for the second time using the same tea-leaves’.

Cupboard love

Those who have food on the table will always be popular:

- giomlainreachd (Scottish Gaelic) the habit of dropping in at meal times
- aimerpok (Inuit) to visit expecting to receive food
- luqma-shumar (Persian) one who attends feasts uninvited and counts the number of mouthfuls

Snap, crackle, pop!

Is it the way they hear it? Or is it simply what sells the product? The sound of Rice Crispies crackling and popping is very different across Europe:

- French: Cric! Crac! Croc!
- German: Knisper! Knasper! Knusper!
- Spanish: Cris! Cras! Cros!

Rice

In Japan, gohan (literally, honourable food) comes in a bowl and means rice that is ready for eating. But it’s also a general name for rice and even extends in meaning to ‘meal’. At the other end of the spectrum is okoge, which is the scorched rice stuck on the bottom of the pan.

False friends

- prune (French) plum
- gin (Phrygian, Turkey) to dry out
- korn (Swedish) barley
- sik (Ukrainian) juice
- glass (Swedish) ice cream
- prick (Thai) pepper
- chew (Amharic, Ethiopia) salt

Hawaiian bananas

Hawaii’s traditional cuisine is based on quite a restricted list of ingredients: fish (there are 65 words alone for describing fishing nets), sweet potato (108 words), sugarcane (42) and bananas (47). The following are among the most descriptive words for this fruit:

- mai’a kaua lau a banana, dark green when young, and yellow and waxy when mature
- kapule a banana hanging until its skin has black spots
- palaku a thoroughly ripe banana
- maui to wring the stem of a bunch of bananas to cause it to ripen
- pola the hanging down of the blossom of a banana palm or a bunch of bananas
- halane a large bunch of bananas
- hua’alua a double bunch of bananas
- manila a banana tree not used for fruit but for rope fibre
- lele a tall wild banana placed near the altar, offered to the gods and also used for love magic

Replete

As the meal enters its final stages, a sense of well-being descends on the diner – unless, of course, you’re suffering from bersat (Malay), food that has gone down the wrong way …

- uitbuiken (Dutch) to take your time at dinner, relaxing between courses (literally, the expansion of the stomach)
- nakkele (Tulu, India) a man who licks whatever the food has been served on
- slappare (Italian) to eat everything, even to the point of licking the plate
- ’akapu’aki’aki (Cook Islands Maori) to belch repeatedly

Post-prandial

After it’s all over, what are you left with?

- femlans (Ullans, Northern Ireland) the remains of a meal
- sunasorpok (Inuit) to eat the remains of others’ food
- shitta (Persian) food left at night and eaten in the morning

Food poisoning

Visitors to Easter Island would be advised to distinguish between the Rapa Nui words hakahana (leaving cooked food for another day) and kai hakahana (food from the previous day that is starting to rot).

Hunger

Food cannot always be taken for granted. Homowo is a Ghanaian word that means ‘hoots at hunger’. Local oral tradition recalls a distant past when the rains failed and there was a terrible famine on the Accra Plains, the home of the Ga people. When a good harvest finally came and there was more than enough to eat once again, the Ghanaians celebrated by holding a festival, still celebrated to this day, that ridiculed hunger.

Daily Bread

Food often figures in colloquial sayings and proverbs, as this selection from Spain shows:

- quien con hambre se acuesta con pan suena whoever goes to bed hungry dreams of bread (to have a bee in one’s bonnet)
- agua fría y pan caliente, nunca hicieron buen vientre cold water and hot bread never made a good belly (oil and water never mix)
- pan tierno y leña verde, la casa pierde fresh bread and green firewood lose the house (two wrongs do not make a right)
- vale bolillo it’s worth a piece of bread (it doesn’t matter)
- con su pan se lo coma may he eat it with bread (good luck to him)

Quenched
After all this talk of food and eating, it’s hard not to feel thirsty:

- gurfa (Arabic) the amount of water scooped up in one hand
- tegok (Malay) the water one can swallow at a gulp
- qamus (Persian) [a well] so abundant in water that the bucket disappears
- yewh-ma (Wagiman, Australia) to scrape out a hole in the sand to collect fresh water
- jabh (Persian) arriving at a well and finding no water

Bakbuk bakbuk bakbuk

Like the English expression ‘glug glug glug’, the Hebrew word for bottle, bakbuk, derives from the sound of liquid being poured from it.

Pythons and sponges

Those who have not experienced sgriob (Scottish Gaelic), the itchiness that overcomes the upper lip just before taking a sip of whisky, may have suffered from olfrýgt (Viking Danish), the fear of a lack of ale. And it’s not always a fish the world drinks like:

- beber como uma esponja (Portuguese) to drink like a sponge
- uwabami no yo ni nomu (Japanese) to drink like a python
- geiin suru (Japanese) to drink like a whale
- bjór-reifr (Old Icelandic) cheerful from beer-drinking
- sternhagelvoll (German) completely drunk (literally, full of stars and hail)

Plastered

To the sober, it’s always intriguing to see what drunken people are convinced they can do when under the influence, such as trying to walk in a straight line (kanale'o in Hawaiian). Perhaps it’s best to bear in mind the Romanian proverb dacă doi spun că eşti beat, du-te şi te culcă, if two people say you’re drunk, go to sleep.

The morning after

at have tommernaend (Danish) having a hangover (literally, to have carpenters, i.e. hearing the noise of drilling, sawing, etc.)

Katzenjammer (German) a very severe hangover (literally, the noise made by extremely miserable cats)
A useful excuse

As they say in Aymara (Bolivia and Peru), umjayanipxitütuwa –they must have made me drink.

On reflection

Doormat dandy

Languages are full of traps for the unwary, particularly when it comes to words that sound similar but mean very different things:

Spanish: el papa the Pope; la papa potato
Albanian: cubar ladies’ man, womanizer; cube proud, courageous girl
Kerja, Indonesia: aderana prostitute; aderôna perfume Italian: zerbino doormat; zerbinotto dandy
Arabic: khadij premature child; khidaj abortion Albanian: shoq husband; shog bald man; shop blockhead
u miericu pietusu fa la piaga verminusa (Calabrian, Italy)
the physician with too much pity will cause the wound to fester

Ouch!
The exclamation denoting pain has many varieties. If you touch a boiling kettle in Korea you cry aiya, in the Philippines aruy and in France aie. In Russian you scream oj, in Danish uh and in German aua.

Atishoo!
In Japan one sneeze signifies praise (ichi home); two sneezes, criticism (ni-kusashi); three sneezes, disparagement (san-kenashi), while four or more sneezes are taken to mean, quite reasonably, that a cold is on its way (yottsujio wa kaze no moto). Meanwhile, in Mexico, one sneeze is answered with the word salud (health); two sneezes with dinero (money); three sneezes with amor (love); four or more sneezes with alergias (allergies); laughter often accompanies four sneezes, because health, money and love are obviously more desirable than allergies.

Bless you!
In response to someone sneezing, the Germans say Gesundheit, ‘health to you’, and the French à tes souhaits, literally, ‘to your wishes’. In Sierre Leone, Mende speakers say biseh, or ‘thank you’; in Malagasy, the language of Madagascar, they say velona, ‘alive’, while the Bembe speakers of the Congo say kuma, ‘be well’. In Tonga a sneeze is often taken to be a sign that your loved one is missing you.

Sneezing protocol
In Brazil, they say saúde (health) and the sneezer answers amen. In Arabic, the sneezer says alhumdullilah (‘praise be to God’) first, to which the other person responds yarhamukumu Allah (‘may God have mercy on you’). The sneezer then replies to that with athabakumu Allah (‘may God reward you’). In Iran, things are more complex. There they say afiyat bashe (‘I wish you good health’) and the sneezer replies elahi shokr (‘thank God for my health’). After the first sneeze Iranians are then supposed to stop whatever they were doing for a few minutes before continuing. If the sneeze interrupts a decision it is taken as an indication not to go ahead. Ignoring the single sneeze means risking bad luck. However, a second sneeze clears the slate.

Falling ill

The miseries of the sick bed are universally known:

- smertensleje (Danish) to toss and turn on your bed in pain
- fanbing (Chinese) to have an attack of one’s old illness
- ruttlin (Cornish) the sound of phlegm rattling in the bronchial tubes
- miryachit (Russian) a disease in which the sufferer mimics everything that is said or done by another

False friends

- gem (Mongolian) defect
- lavman (Turkish) enema
- angel (Dutch) sting
- bad (Arabic) amputation
- bladder (Dutch) blister
- santa (Egyptian Arabic) wart
- turd (Persian) delicate or fragile

Bedside manner

Illness demands sympathy, but the Indonesian word besuk suggests that this is not always forthcoming. It means to refuse to visit a sick person. Possibly with good reason:

- bawwal (Persian) one who pisses in bed
- osurgan (Turkish) someone who farts a lot
- dobol (Indonesian) to have a swollen anus
- ra’ora’oa (Cook Islands Maori) to have swollen testicles
- kepuyuh (Indonesian) to have to urinate
- jerrkjerrk (Wagiman, Australia) diarrhoea
- chiasse (French) runs induced by fear

Impatient?

Perhaps the most telling word in the lexicon of sickness is the Chinese word huiji-jyi – to avoid following your doctor’s advice for fear of being recognized as the sufferer of a disease.
Vowelless

The Tashlhiyt dialect of Berber (North Africa) is known for its vowelless words: tzgr, she crossed, and rglx, I locked. Among the longest are tkksstt, you took it off, and tfkktstt, you sprained it. And if we accept ‘r’ as a consonant (which is debatable in Czech, as ‘l’ and ‘r’ function as sonorants and so fulfil the role of a vowel) then words consisting entirely of consonants are common in their language: krk, neck; prst, finger or toe; smrk, pine tree; smrt, death. Words beginning with five consonants are not unknown: cvr, quarter and cvrt, Thursday. Likewise in Croatian/Bosnian/Serbian there are: crkva, church; mrvka, carrot; trg, market and zrtva, vinegar.
xian zhang de meimao, bi bu shang hou zhang de huzi (Chinese) the eyebrows that started growing first can’t compare with the beard that started growing later

In the family way

Pregnancy can be something of a mixed blessing:

- mirkha (Quechuan, Peru) the freckles or spots on a woman’s face during pregnancy
- waham (Arabic) the craving for certain foods during pregnancy

- tafarrus (Persian) the fainting of a pregnant woman

Birth pains

When it comes to childbirth, English tends to be coy. There is no English equivalent for the Inuit word paggiq, which describes the flesh torn as a woman delivers a baby, nor for the Japanese chigobami – bites inflicted on a mother’s nipple by a suckling baby. As for the less painful aspects of giving birth, we lack the Indonesian word uek, the sound of a baby crying when being born, the very precise Ulwa word from Nicaragua, asahnaka, to hold a child on one’s hip with its legs straddling the hipbone facing the mother’s side, let alone the Persian term kundamoya, which is the hair a child is born with.
Birthing partner

The Inuit have a word tunumiaq which denotes the person who supports a pregnant woman’s back during labour.

First steps in the deep Pacific

In Rapa Nui (Easter Island) there are five detailed words to describe a baby’s early progress: kaukau is a newborn baby first moving its hands and feet; puepue is when it begins to distinguish people and objects; tahuri is when it starts to move from side to side; totoro is when it’s learned to crawl; mahaga is when it is able to stand by itself.

Toddling

English is strangely deficient when it comes to observing the many stages of development:

- teete (Zarma, Nigeria) to teach a toddler how to walk
- menetah (Indonesian) to help a little child walk by holding its hands to keep it in balance
- pokankuni (Tulu, India) to learn by looking at others
- keke (Hawaiian) a word of caution to children to cover their nakedness

Growing pains

The next few years are crucial:

- polekayi (Tulu, India) writing in a large crooked hand as children tend to do
- qiangda (Chinese) a race to be the first to answer a question
- nylentik (Indonesian) to hit a child’s ear with the index finger
- paski (Tulu, India) punishing a boy by making him alternate between standing and sitting with his arms crossed and both ears seized by his fingers
- zhangjin (Chinese) the progress made in one’s intellectual or moral education
- Polterabend (German) a stag party for both sexes at which crockery is broken celebrating the end of their single lives
- ronin (Japanese) a student who has failed a university entrance examination and is waiting to retake it (adapted from its original sense of a lordless wandering samurai warrior)

Boys and girls

Some cultures go further than merely differentiating between children and adolescents. The Indonesian word balita refers to those under five years old; the Hindi term kumari means a girl between ten and twelve, while bala is a young woman under the age of sixteen. The Cook Islands Maoris continue the sequence with mapu, a youth from about sixteen to twenty-five.

False friends

- compromisso (Portuguese) engagement
- embarazada (Spanish) pregnant
- anus (Latin) old woman
- chin (Persian) one who catches money thrown at weddings
- moon (Khakas, Siberia) to hang oneself
- bath (Scottish Gaelic) to drown hoho (Hausa, Nigeria) condolences

Mid-life crisis

Before we know it, the carefree days of our youth are just fading memories:

- sanada arba' (Arabic) to be pushing forty
- parebos (Ancient Greek) being past one’s prime
- kahala (Arabic) to be an old fogey at the height of one’s life
- Torschlusspanik (German) the fear of diminishing opportunities as one gets older (literally, gate-closing panic); this word is often applied to women worried about being too old to have children

Getting older Hawaiian-style

The Hawaiians have a highly specific vocabulary to describe the effects of what the Germans call Lebensabend, the twilight of life:

- ’aufa a woman beginning to become wrinkled
- ku’olo an old man with sagging cheeks
- kani ko’o an aged man who needs to carry a cane
- kani mo’opuna the state of old age when one has many grandchildren
- hakalunu extreme old age, as when one is no longer able to walk
- ka‘i koko bedridden; so old one needs to be carried in a net
- pala lau hala the advanced loss of hair; the last stage of life

Kicking the bucket

Other languages have highly inventive euphemisms for the tricky subject of passing on:

- nolikt karoti (Latvian) to put down the spoon
- colgar los guantes (Spanish, Central America) to hang up the gloves
- het hoek omgaan (Dutch) to go around the corner
- bater a bota/esticar a perna (Portuguese) to hit the boot or to stretch the leg
- avaler son bulletin de naissance (French) to swallow one’s birth certificate

The final reckoning

- adjal (Indonesian) the predestined hour of one’s death
- Liebestod (German) dying for love or because of a romantic tragedy
- pagezuar (Albanian) the state of dying before enjoying the happiness that comes with being married or seeing one’s children married

Chinese whispers

Chinese has a rich vocabulary when it comes to the last moments of life:

- huiguang fanzhao the momentary recovery of someone who is dying
- yiyi a person’s last words
- yiyuan a person’s last or unfulfilled wish
- mingmu to die with one’s eyes closed, to die without regret
- txiv xaiv a funeral singer whose songs bring helpful, didactic messages from the dead person to the survivors
Last rites

In the end the inevitable takes its course:

- talkin (Indonesian) to whisper to the dying (i.e. words read at the end of a funeral to remind the dead person of what to say to the angels of death)
- farjam-gah (Persian) the final home (grave)

- tunillattukkuuq (Inuit) the act of eating at a cemetery
- akika (Swahili) a domestic feast held either for a child’s first haircut or for its burial

On reflection

Among languages that build up very long words for both simple and complex concepts are those defined as ‘polysynthetic’, and many of them are found in Australia or Papua New Guinea. The Aboriginal Mayali tongue of Western Arnhem Land is an example, forming highly complex verbs able to express a complete sentence, such as: ngabanmarneyawoyhwarrghaganjingeng, meaning ‘I cooked the wrong meat for them again’. (This breaks down into nga: I, ban: them, marne: for, yawoyh: again, warrghah: wrongly directed action, ganj: meat, ginje: cook, ng: past tense.) In the Australian language known as Western Desert, palyamunurringkutjamunurth means ‘he or she definitely did not become bad’.

Germans are not the only ones who like to create complex compound words as nouns. Arbejdsløshedsunderstøttelse is Danish for unemployment benefit, while tilpasningsvanskeligheder means ‘adjustment difficulties’. Precipitevolissimevolmente is Italian for ‘as fast as possible’. And in the Tupi-Guarani Apiaká language of Brazil, tapa-há-ho-huegeuvá means rubber.

But maybe the laurels should go to the Ancient Greek playwright Aristophanes who devised the word lopado-temacho-selacho-galeo-kraino-leipsano-drin-hu-potrimmato-silphio-karabo-melito-katakechuno-kichl-epikossuphphatto-perister-alektruon-opto-kephallio-kigklo-peleio-lagoio-siraio-baphe-tragano-pterugon, a dish compounded of all kinds of dainties, fish, fowl and sauces.
Otherworldly

zig then ma che; dam choe ma ha (Dzongkha, Bhutan)
do not start your worldly life too late; do not start your religious life too early

Beyond the veil

So what lies beyond the beauties of life, in sight, sound and smell? Do we live for ever? And if so, can any of us ever return?

- iwang wayaka (Ulwa, Nicaragua) a spirit that comes out after a person dies, makes noises and yet is never seen
- tarniqsuqtuq (Inuit) a communication with a spirit that is unable to ascend
- raskh (Persian) the transmigration of the human soul into a plant or tree

!Ghost tree

- hrendi thenok (Sherpa, Nepal) to get in touch with the soul of a dead person
- bodach (Scottish Gaelic) the ghost of an old man that comes down the chimney to terrorize children who have been naughty

Spooked in Sumatra

The Indonesians have a particularly varied vocabulary to describe the inhabitants of the spirit world and their attempts to menace the living:

- wewe an ugly female ghost with drooping breasts
- keblak a ghost cockerel which frightens people at night with the sound of its flapping wings
- kuntilanak a ghost masquerading as a beautiful woman to seduce men who are then horrified to find that she actually has a large hole in her back

Looking into the future

A cynical old Chinese proverb offers the thought ruo xin bu, maile wu; mai gua kou, mei liang dou: ‘if you believe in divination you will end up selling your house to pay the diviners’. But attempting to see into the future has been a constant in all societies for thousands of years:

- aayyaf (Arabic) predicting the future by observing the flight of birds
- ustukhwan-tarashi (Persian) divination using the shoulder-blade of a sheep
- haruspex (Latin) a priest who practised divination by examining the entrails of animals
- kilo lani (Hawaiian) an augury who can read the clouds
- sortes (Latin) the seeking of guidance by the chance selection of a passage in a book
- mandal (Arabic) prophesying while staring into a mirror-like surface

Hide away

Scottish Highlanders formerly had an unusual way of divining the future, known as taghairm. This involved wrapping a man in the hide of a freshly butchered bullock and leaving him alone by a waterfall, under a cliff-face, or in some other wild and deserted place. Here he would think about his problem; and whatever answer he came up with was supposed to have been given to him by the spirits who dwelt in such forbidding spots.

False friends

- monaco (Italian) monk
- fish (Arabic) Easter, Passover
- alone (Italian) halo
- fall (Breton) bad
- lav (Armenian) good
- bog (Russian) god

God willing

The French have a term, bondieuserie, which means ostentatious piety. But for many the solace of prayer and faith is both necessary and private:

- saruz-ram (Persian) the first light breaking upon one committed to a contemplative life
- rasf (Persian) the joining together of the feet in prayer (also the joining of stones in pavements)
- thondrol (Dzongkha, Bhutan) the removal of sins through the contemplation of a large religious picture
- kuoha (Hawaiian) a prayer used to bring a wife to love her husband and a husband to love his wife
- tekbir (Arabic) to proclaim the greatness of God, by repeating allahu akkbar, ‘Allah is great’
- pasrah (Indonesian) to leave a problem to God

On reflection
The short of it

Among single letter words to be found among the world’s languages are the following:

u (Samoan) an enlarged land snail u (Xeta, Brazil) to eat animal meat u (Burmese) a male over forty-five (literally, uncle)
i (Korean) a tooth
m (Yakut, Siberia) a bear; an ancestral spirit
All Creatures Great and Small

meglio è esser capo di lucertola che coda di dragone (Italian) better be the head of a lizard than the tail of a dragon

Animal crackers

‘Every dog has his day’; ‘you can take a horse to water, but you can’t make it drink’; ‘a cat may look at a king’. Animals crop up left, right and centre in English sayings and phrases, and in those of other languages too:

- leben wie die Made im Speck (German) to live like a maggot in bacon (life of Riley)
- van een kale kip kan je geen veren plukken (Dutch) you can’t pluck feathers from a bald hen (get blood out of a stone)
- olla ketunhánta kainalossa (Finnish) to have a foxtail under your armpits (ulterior motives)

- estar durmiendo con la mona (Spanish) to be sleeping with the monkey (be drunk)
- eine Kröte schlucken (German) to swallow a toad (make a concession grudgingly)
- bhains ke age bansuri bajana (Hindi) to play a flute in front of a buffalo (cast pearls before swine)
- vot gde sobaka zaryta (Russian) that’s where the dog is buried (the crux of the matter)
- aveler des couleuvres (French) to swallow grass snakes (endure humiliation)
- karincalanmak (Turkish) to be crawling with ants (have pins and needles)

Dragon’s head

The Japanese are particularly fond of animal metaphors:

- itachigokko weasels’ play (a vicious circle)
- gyuho an ox’s walk (a snail’s pace)
- neko no hitai a cat’s forehead (a very small area)
- yabuhebi ni naru to poke at a bush and get a snake (to backfire)
- ryuto dari ni owaru to start with a dragon’s head and end with a snake’s tail (to peter out)
- dasoku snake legs (excessive or superfluous)
- tora ni naru to become a tiger (to get roaring drunk)
- unagi no nedoko an eel’s bed (a long narrow place)
- mushi no idokoro ga warui the location of the worm is bad (in a bad mood)
- kirinji a giraffe child (prodigy)
- kumo no ko o chirasu yo ni like scattering baby spiders (in all directions)
- inu to saru a dog and a monkey (to be on bad terms)
Ships of the desert

As you might expect, the more important an animal is to a particular culture, the more words there are for it. The cattle-herding Masai of Kenya and Tanzania, for example, have seventeen distinct words for cattle; the jungle-based Baniwa tribe of Brazil has twenty-nine for ant (with a range that includes the edible); while in Somali there are no fewer than forty-three words relating to camels of every possible variety. Here are a few:

- qoorqab an uncastrated male camel
- awradhale a stud camel that always breeds male camels
- gurgurshaa a docile pack-camel suitable for carrying delicate items
- sidig one of two female camels suckling the same baby camel
- guran a herd of camels no longer producing milk that is kept away from dwelling areas
- baatir a mature female camel that has had no offspring
- gulguuluc the low bellow of a camel when it is sick or thirsty
- cayuun camel spit
- u maqaarsaar to put the skin of a dead baby camel on top of a living one in order to induce its mother to give milk
- uusmiiro to extract drinking water from the stomach of a camel to drink during a period of drought
- guree to make room for a person to sit on a loaded camel
- tulud one’s one and only camel

Persian also has its own detailed camel vocabulary that suggests an even more recalcitrant beast:

- nakhur a camel that will not give milk until her nostrils are tickled
- wakhd a camel that throws out its feet in the manner of an ostrich
- munqamih a camel that raises its head and refuses to drink any more
- zirad a rope tied round a camel’s neck to prevent it from vomiting on its rider

Horses for courses

Many languages have very specific words to describe not only types of horse but also its activities and attributes. In the Quechuan language of Peru, tharmiy is a horse that stands on its hind legs and kicks out with its forelegs. The Bulgar lungur is an unfit horse, while the Malay kuda padi is a short-legged horse for riding. Dasparan, from the Khowan language of Pakistan, describes the mating of horses and the Russian nochoe means the pasturing of horses for the night. Persian has an extravagance of equine vocabulary:

- zaru a horse that travels nimbly with long steps
- mirjam a horse that makes the dirt fly when running
- raji a horse returning tired from a journey only to be immediately dispatched upon another
- raki to strike a horse with the heel to make it gallop
- zau’ shaking the horse’s rein to quicken the pace
- shiyar riding a horse backwards and forwards to show it off to a buyer
- safin a horse standing on three legs and touching the ground with the tip of its fourth hoof

Man’s best friend

The Indians of Guatemala have a word, nagual, which describes an animal, chosen at birth, whose fate is believed to have a direct effect on the prosperity of its owner.

Hopping mad

The Kunwinjku of Australia use a range of words to describe the way in which kangaroos hop; in part this is because, from a distance, the easiest way to identify a particular type of kangaroo is by the way it moves. Thus kanjedjme is the hopping of a wallaroo, kamawudme is the hopping of a male Antilopine wallaroo, and kadjalwahme is the hopping of the female. Kamurlbardme is the hopping of a black wallaroo and kalurlhlurlme is the hopping of an agile wallaby.

False friends

ape (Italian) bee anz (Arabic) wasp bum (Arabic) owl
medusa (Spanish) jellyfish slurp (Afrikaans) elephant's trunk ukelele (Tongan) jumping flea

Shoo!

The Latin American sape, the German husch and the Pashto (of Afghanistan and Pakistan) tsheghe tsheghe are among the many similar-sounding words that mean ‘shoo’. Other animal commands refer to particular creatures: Pashto pishte pishte is said when chasing cats away; gja gja is the Bulgar driving call to horses; kur is the Indonesian call to chickens to come to be fed; and belekisi ontu (Aukan, Suriname) is an insult hurled at a dog. The Malays are even more specific, with song, the command to an elephant to lift one leg, and soh, the cry to a buffalo to turn left.

Peacocks’ tails

Many languages identify specific parts or attributes of animals for which there is no direct English equivalent. Kauhaga moa is the word used by Easter Islanders to designate the first and shortest claw of a chicken, while candraka in Tulu (India) is the eye pattern that appears on the feathers of a peacock’s tail and kannu is the star in the feather. In several languages there are particular words for different types of animal excrement: monkey urine in the Guajá language (Brazil) is kalukaluk-kaí; the liquid part of chicken excrement in Ulwa (Nicaragua) is daraba; while in Persian the little bit of sweat and dung attached to a sheep’s groin and tail is called wazahat.

Kissing and hissing

Other words describe the closely observed actions of animals, many of which we can instantly recognize:

- mengais (Indonesian) to scratch on the ground with claws in search of food (generally used of a chicken)
- apisik (Turkish) any animal holding its tail between its legs
- maj u maj (Persian) kissing and licking (as a cat does to her kittens)
- greann (Scottish Gaelic) the hair bristling as on an enraged dog
- fahha (Arabic) the hissing of a snake
- tau’ani (Cook Islands Maori) to squeal at one another while fighting (used of cats)
- kikamu (Hawaiian) the gathering of fish about a hook that they hesitate to bite
- alevandring (Danish) the migration of the eel
- paarnguliaq (Inuit) a seal that has strayed and now can’t find its breathing hole

Two Persian tricks

Tuti’i pas ayina is a person sitting behind a mirror who teaches a parrot to talk by making it believe that it is its own likeness seen in the mirror which is pronouncing the words. While kalb is the practice of imitating barking to induce dogs to respond and thus show whether a particular dwelling is inhabited or not.

Animal magnetism

Some animal words attract other meanings as well. Hausa of Nigeria uses mesa to mean both python and water hose, and jak both donkey and wheelbarrow. Wukur in Arabic signifies a bird of prey’s nest and an aircraft hangar and, intriguingly, zamma means both to put a bridle on a camel and to be supercilious. For the Wagiman of Australia wanganyjarri describes a green ants’ nest and an armpit, while for the French papillon is both a butterfly and a parking ticket.

The flying squad

In Hopi, an Amerindian language, masa’ytaka is used to denote insects, aeroplanes, pilots; in fact, everything that flies except birds.

Tamed

Humans have rarely been content to let animals run wild and free; using them in one way or another has defined the relationship between two and four legs:

- ch’llpiy (Quechuan, Peru) to mark livestock by cutting their ears
- bolas (Spanish) two or three heavy balls joined by a cord used to entangle the legs of animals
- oorxax (Khakas, Siberia) a wooden ring in the nose of a calf (to prevent it from suckling from its mother)
- hundeskole (Danish) a dog-training school

Animal sounds

In Albanian, Danish, English, Hebrew and Polish, to name just a few languages, bees make a buzzing sound, and cats miaow. However, no language but English seems to think that owls go ‘tu-whit, tu-woo’ or a cockerel goes ‘cock-a-doodle-doo’. And not everyone agrees about the birds and the bees either:

Spring weather is like a child’s face, changing three times a day

And the forecast is …

Despite our obsession with the weather, the English language doesn’t cover all the bases when it comes to precise observations of the natural world …

- serein (French) fine rain falling from a cloudless sky
- imbat (Turkish) a daytime summer sea breeze ‘inapoiri’ (Cook Islands Maori) a moonless night
- wamadat (Persian) the intense heat of a still, sultry night
- gumusservi (Turkish) moonlight shining on water
- tojii (Tulu, India) the scum of water collected into bubbles
- efterarsfarver (Danish) autumn colours

… though, inevitably, there are some local phenomena that we have to struggle harder to imagine:

- wilikoi (Hawaiian) substances that are gathered up in the centre of a whirlwind
- isblink (Swedish) the luminous appearance of the horizon caused by reflection from ice

Meteorological metaphors

Our descriptions of the weather often use metaphors, such as raining cats and dogs, but some languages use the weather itself as the metaphor:

- Schnee von gestern (German) yesterday’s snow (water under the bridge)
• huutaa tuuleen (Finnish) to shout to the wind (to do something that has no use)
• aven solen har fläckar (Swedish) even the sun has got spots (no one is perfect)
• snést někomu modré z nebe (Czech) to bring the blue down from the sky for someone (do anything to please them)
• chap phar kah chap jil pa chu kha ray (Dzongkha, Bhutan) the rain falls yonder, but the drops strike here (indirect remarks hit the target)
• xihuitl barq (Arabic) lightning without a downpour (a disappointment, a disillusionment or an unkept promise)

Those words for snow

The number of different Inuit words for snow has been the subject of endless debate, few people taking into account the fact that the now-offensive group name ‘Eskimo’ (from the French Esquimaux, derived from North American Algonquian and literally meaning ‘eaters of raw flesh’) covers a number of different language areas: Inuit in Greenland and Canada, Yupik in Eastern Siberia and Aleut in Alaska. Here is a selection of words for snow from some Inuit languages:

- snow, kaniktshaq; no snow, aputaitok; to snow, qanir, qanunge, qanugglir; snowy weather, nittaatsuq, qannirsuq; to get fine snow or rain particles, kanecir; first falling, apingaut; light falling, qanialaag; wet and falling, natatgo naq; in the air, falling, qanit; feathery clumps of falling snow, qanipalaat; air thick with snow, nittaalaq; rippled surface of snow, kaiyuglak; light, deep enough for walking, katik-sugnik; fresh without any ice, kanut; crusty, sillik; soft for travelling, mauya; soft and deep where snowshoes are needed for travel, taiga; powder, nutagak; salty, pokaktok; wind-beaten, upsik; fresh, nutaryuk; packed, aniu; sharp, panar; crusty that breaks under foot, karakartanaq; rotten, slush on sea, qinuq; best for building an igloo, pukaan-gajuq; glazed in a thaw, kiksrukak; watery, mangokpok; firm (the easiest to cut, the warmest, the preferred), pukajaw; loose, newly fallen which cannot be used as it is, but can provide good building material when compacted, ariloqat; for melting into water, aniuq; that a dog eats, aniusarpok; that can be broken through, mauya; floating on water, qanissiq; for building, auverk; on clothes, ayak; beaten from clothes, tiluktorpok; much on clothes, aputainmarowok; crust, pukak; cornice, formation about to collapse, navcaq; on the boughs of trees, qali; blown indoors, sullarniq; snowdrift overhead and about to fall, mavsa; snowdrift that blocks something, kimaugruk; smoky drifting snow, siqoq; arrow-shaped snowdrift, kaluto-ganiq; newly drifting snow, akerlorak; space between drifts and obstruction, anamana, anymanyaa; snowstorm, pirsuq, pirsirsursuaq, qux; violent snowstorm, igadug; blizzard, pirta, pirtuk; avalanche, sisuuk, aput sisurtuq; to get caught in an avalanche, navcipe.

There are also a large number of Inuit words for ice, covering everything from icicles through ‘solidly frozen slush’ to ‘open pack ice in seawater’.

Highland mist

Either there is more weather in the cold, wet places of the world or people have more time to think about and define it. The Scots may not have as many words for snow as the Inuits, but they have a rich vocabulary for their generally cool and damp climate.

Dreich is their highly evocative word for a miserably wet day. Gentle rain or smirr might be falling, either in a dribble (drizzle) or in a dreep (steady but light rainfall). Plowtery (showery) weather may shift to a gandiegow (squall), a pish-oot (complete downpour), or a thunder-plump (sudden rainstorm accompanied by thunder and lightning). Any of these is likely to make the average walker feel dowie (downhearted) as they push on through the slaister (liquid bog) and glaur (mire), even if they’re not yet drookit (soaked to the skin). The track in front of them will probably be covered with dubs (puddles), as the neighbouring burn (stream) grows into a fast-flowing linn (torrent).

The very next day the weather may be different again, and the walker beset by blenter (gusty wind). Or if it’s grulie (unsettled), there’s always the hope that it might turn out leesome (fair) with a lovely pirl (soft breeze). And then, after the next plype (sudden heavy shower), there may even be a watergow (faint rainbow). In deepest winter it will generally be snell (piercingly cold), and sometimes fair jeelit (icily so) among the wreaths (drifts) of snow.

For a precious few fair days in summer, there may even be a simmer cowt (heat haze), though the more austere will be relieved that the likelihood of discomfort remains high on account of the fierce-biting mudges (midges).

Sound bites

The sounds of most of the words we use have little to do with their meanings. But there are exceptions in other languages, too. For best results try saying the words out loud:

- ata-ata (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) to laugh
- ba’a (Hausa, Nigeria) ridicule, mockery
- baqbaq (Arabic) garrulous
- bulubushile (Bemba, Congo and Zambia) a stammer or lisp
- capcap (Maltese) to clap
- chopchop (Chamorro, Guam, USA) to suck
- cizir cizir (Turkish) with a sizzling noise
- karkara (Arabic) to rumble (of a stomach)
- kekek-kekek (Malay) to giggle
- kitikiti (Tulu, India) the ticking of a watch; or giggling, tittering

- pes pes (Pashto, Afghanistan and Pakistan) whispering
- pshurr (Albanian) to urinate, to wet one’s clothes
- raxxax (Maltese) to drizzle
- ringongo (Gilbertese, Kiribati) to snore
- taptap (Maltese) to patter
- yuyurungul (Yindiny, Australia) the noise of a snake sliding through the grass
- xiaoxiao (Chinese) the whistling and pattering of rain or wind
- zonk zonk (Turkish) to throb terribly

Making a splash

Local experience shapes local language. The Tulu people of India, for example, have a fine array of evocative, specific words to do with water: gulum describes a stone falling into a well; gulugulu is filling a pitcher with water; caracara is spurting water from a pump; budubudu is bubbling, gushing water; jalabala is bubbling or boiling... water; salasala is pouring water; while calacala describes the action of children wading through water as they play.

Ding dong

The sound of an altogether noisier culture can be heard in Indonesian: kring is the sound of a bicycle bell; dentang, cans being hit repeatedly; reat-reot, the squeaking of a door; ning-nong, the ringing of a doorbell; jedar-jedor, a door banging repeatedly. But there are gentler moments, too: kecipak-kecipung is hands splashing water in a rhythm, while desus is a quiet and smooth sound as of someone farting but not very loudly.

Chirping cuckoos

The Basques of the Pyrenees also use highly expressive words. You might recognize such terms as kuku (a cuckoo), miau (miaou), mu (moo), durruna (thunder), zurrumuru (a whisper) and urtzintzu (to sneeze), but could you guess the meaning of these?

Sounds Japanese

The Japanese can be equally imitative: shikushiku is to cry continuously while sniffling, and zeizei is the sound of air being forced through the windpipe when one has a cold or respiratory illness. We can hear perhaps a gathering of Japanese women in kusukusu, to giggle or titter, especially in a suppressed voice; and of men in geragera, a belly laugh. Moving from the literal to the more imaginative, the Japanese have sa, the sound of a machine with the switch on, idling quietly; sooay sooay, fish swimming; susu, the sound of air passing continuously through a small opening.

Gitaigo describes a more particular Japanese concept: words that try to imitate not just sounds, but states of feeling. So gatcha gatcha describes an annoying noise; harahara refers to one’s reaction to something one is directly involved in; and chiaicha is used of a couple engaging in a public display of affection viewed as unsavoury by passers-by. Mimicry of feelings extends to descriptions of the way we see: so jirojirou is to stare in fascination; tekateka is the shiny appearance of a smooth (often cheap-looking) surface; pichapicha is splashing water; and kirakira is a small light that blinks repeatedly.

Sounds familiar
Not all words about sound are imitative; or perhaps it’s just that things strike the ear differently in other parts of the world:

- bagabaga (Tulu, India) the crackling of a fire
- desir (Malay) the sound of sand driven by the wind
- faamiti (Samoan) to make a squeaking sound by sucking air past the lips in order to gain the attention of a dog or children
- riman (Arabic) the sound of a stone thrown at a boy

!Image of a kettle

- ghiqq (Persian) the sound made by a boiling kettle
- kertek (Malay) the sound of dry leaves or twigs being trodden underfoot
- lushindo (Bemba, Congo and Zambia) the sound of footsteps
- nyangi (Yindiny, Australia) any annoying noise
- yuyin (Chinese) the remnants of sound which remain in the ears of the hearer

Top ten

In terms of numbers of speakers, the top ten world languages are as follows:

1. Mandarin 1,000+ million
2. English 508 million
3. Hindi 497 million
4. Spanish 342 million
5. Russian 277 million
6. Arabic 246 million
7. Bengali 211 million
8. Portuguese 191 million
9. Malay–Indonesian 159 million
10. French 129 million
Seeing Things

cattiva è quella lana che non si puo tingere (Italian)

it is a bad cloth that will take no colour

Colourful language

We might well think that every language has a word for every colour, but this isn’t so. Nine languages distinguish only between black and white. In Dan, for example, which is spoken in New Guinea, people talk in terms of things being either milí (darkish) or mola (lightish).

Twenty-one languages have distinct words for black, red and white only; eight have those colours plus green; then the sequence in which additional colours are brought into languages is yellow, with a further eighteen languages, then blue (with six) and finally brown (with seven).

Across the spectrum

As with colours, so with the rainbow. The Bassa language of Liberia identifies only two colours: ziza (red/orange/yellow) and hui (green/ blue/purple) in their spectrum. The Shona of Zimbabwe describe four: cipsuka (red/orange), cicena (yellow and yellow-green), citema (green-blue) and cipsuka again (the word also represents the purple end of the spectrum). It is just Europeans and the Japanese who pick out seven colours: red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet.

Welsh blues

The Welsh for blue is glas, as in the expression yng nglas y dydd, in the blue of the day (the early morning). But glas is a hard-working word. It’s also used in the expression gorau glas (blue best), to mean to do one’s best, and, changing tack rather dramatically, it appears as glas wen (blue smile), a smile that is insincere and mocking. In Welsh literature, glas is a colour that is somewhere between green, blue and grey; it also has poetic meanings of both youth and death.

Thai dress code

Thais believe that if they dress in a certain colour each day it will bring them good luck. The code is: Monday, yellow (hueang); Tuesday, pink (chom poo); Wednesday, green (kiaw); Thursday, orange (som); Friday, blue (nam ngem); Saturday, purple (muang); Sunday, red (daeng). Black (dam) is not lucky for conservative people and is reserved for funerals; unless you are young, in which case it’s seen as edgy and sophisticated.

Colour-coded

We can be green with envy, see red, or feel a bit blue. Colours have a strong symbolic force, but not everyone agrees on what they stand for:

Red
- makka na uso (Japanese) a deep red (outright) lie
- aka no tannin (Japanese) a red (total) stranger
- film a luci rosse (Italian) a red (blue) film
- romanzo rosa (Italian) a pink (romantic) story
- vyspat se do červena/růžova (Czech) to sleep oneself into the red (have had a good night’s sleep)

Yellow
- jaune d’envie (French) yellow (green) with envy
- gelb vor Eifersucht werden (German) to become yellow with jealousy
- kiroi koi (Japanese) a yellow (particularly screeching) scream
- gul och blå (Swedish) yellow and blue (black and blue)

Black
- svartsjuk (Swedish) black ill (jealousy)
- hara guroi (Japanese) black stomach (wicked)

- être noir (French) to be black (drunk)
- mustasukkainen (Finnish) wearing black socks (jealous)

White
andare in bianco (Italian) to go into the white (to have no success with someone romantically)
ak akce kara gun icindir (Turkish) white money for a black day (savings for a rainy day) un mariage blanc (French) a white marriage (a marriage of convenience) obléci bílý kabát (archaic Czech) to put on the white coat (to join the army)

Blue
aoki toiki (Japanese) sighing with blue breath (suffering) blau sein (German) to be blue (drunk) en être bleu (French) to be in the blue (struck dumb) aoku naru (Japanese) blue with fright blått öga (Swedish) blue eye (black eye) modré pondělí (Czech) blue Monday (a Monday taken as holiday after the weekend)

Green
al verde (Italian) in the green (short of cash) vara pa gron kvist (Swedish) as rich as green (wealthy) langue verte (French) green language (slang) darse un verde (Spanish) to give oneself greens (to tuck into one’s food) aotagai (Japanese) to buy green rice fields (to employ college students prematurely)

Polyglossary

Two countries, Papua New Guinea with over 850 languages and Indonesia with around 670, are home to a quarter of the world’s languages. If we add the seven countries that each possess more than two hundred languages (Nigeria 410, India 380, Cameroon 270, Australia 250, Mexico 240, Zaire 210, Brazil 210), the total comes to almost 3,500; which is to say that more than half of the world’s spoken languages come from just nine countries.

If we look at it in terms of continents, North, Central and South America have around one thousand spoken languages, which is about 15 per cent; Africa has around 30 per cent; Asia a bit over 30 per cent; and the Pacific somewhat under 20 per cent. Europe is by far the least diverse, having only 3 per cent of the world’s languages.
c’est la goutte d’eau qui fait déborder le vase French _ it’s the drop of water that makes the vase overflow_

Countdown

You might expect words to get longer as numbers get bigger, so perhaps it’s a surprise to find that in some languages the words for single digits are a real mouthful. In the Ona-Shelknam language of the Andes, for example, eight is _ningayuneng aRvinelegh_. And in Athabaskan Koyukon (an Alaskan language) you need to get right through _neelk’etoak’eekeleekeedeeoeane_ to register the number seven.

Vital statistics

The world’s vocabulary of numbers moves from the precise …

- parab (Assyrian, Middle East) five-sixths
- halvfemte (Danish) four and a half
- lakh (Hindustani) one hundred thousand

… to the vague:

- tobaiti (Machiguengan, Peru) any quantity above four
- mpusho (Bemba, Congo and Zambia) any unit greater than the number ten
- birkacinci (Turkish) umpteen

Counting in old China

From the very biggest to the very smallest, the Ancient Chinese were highly specific in their delineation of numbers, from:

- tsai 100 trillion
- cheng 10 trillion
- chien a trillion
- kou 100 billion
- jang 10 billion
- pu / tzu a billion
- kai 100 million
- ching 10 million

right down to:

- ch’ien one tenth
Double-digit growth

Counting in multiples of ten probably came from people totting up items on their outspread fingers and thumbs. Some cultures, however, have approached matters rather differently. The Ancient Greeks rounded things off to sixty (for their low numbers) and 360 (for their high numbers) and speakers of old Germanic used to say 120 to mean many. The Yuki of Northern California counted in multiples of eight (being the space between their two sets of fingers) and rounded off high numbers at sixty-four. Some Indian tribes in California based their multiples on five and ten; others liked four as it expressed North, South, East and West; others six because it added to those directions the worlds above and below ground.

Magic numbers

Different cultures give different significance to different numbers. Western traditions offer the five senses and the seven sins, among other groupings. Elsewhere we find very different combinations. The following list is drawn from the Tulu language of India unless otherwise stated:

Three
- tribhuvara the three worlds: heaven, earth and hell
- trivarga the three human objects: love, duty and wealth

Four
- nalvarti the four seasons

Five
- pancabhuta the five elements: earth, air, fire, water and ether
- pancaloha the five chief metals: gold, silver, copper, iron and lead
- pancavarna the five colours: white, black, red, yellow and green
- pancamahapataka the five greatest sins: murdering a Brahman, stealing gold, drinking alcohol, seducing the wife of one’s spiritual mentor, and associating with a person who has committed such sins
- pancavadya the five principal musical instruments: lute, cymbals, drum, trumpet and oboe

Six
- liuqin (Chinese) the six relations (father, mother, elder brothers, younger brothers, wife and children)

Seven
- haft rang (Persian) the seven colours of the heavenly bodies: Saturn, black; Jupiter, brown; Mars, red; the Sun, yellow; Venus, white; Mercury, blue; and the Moon, green

Eight
- ashtabhoga the eight sources of enjoyment: habitation, bed, clothing, jewels, wife, flower, perfumes and betel-leaf/areca nut

Nine
- sembako (Indonesian) the nine basic commodities that people need for everyday living: rice, flour, eggs, sugar, salt, cooking oil, kerosene, dried fish and basic textiles Ten

dah ak (Persian) the ten vices – named after the tyrant Zahhak who was notorious for ten defects of body or mind: ugliness, shortness of stature, excessive pride, indecency, gluttony, scurrility, cruelty, hastiness, falsehood and cowardice

Expressed numerically

Specific numbers are also used in some colloquial phrases:

- mettre des queues aux zeros (French) to add tails to noughts (to overcharge)
- siete (Spanish, Central America) seven (a right-angled tear)
- Mein Rad hat eine Acht (German) my bike has an eight (a buckled wheel)
- se mettre sur son trente et un (French) to put yourself on your thirty-one (to get all dressed up)
- ein Gesicht wie 7 Tage Regenwetter haben (German) to have a face like seven days of rain (a long face)

Kissing time

The adult understanding of the French number soixante-neuf (69) is well known. Less familiar is the other meaning of quatre-vingt-huit (88) – a kiss.

Take your time

Not everyone sees time in terms of past, present and future. The Kipsigis of the Nile region have three types of past tense: today’s past, yesterday’s past and the distant past. Several American Indian languages divide the past tense into the recent past, remote past and mythological past; other languages have different definitions:

- pal (Hindi) a measure of time equal to twenty-four seconds
- ghari (Hindi) a small space of time (twenty-four minutes)
- tulat (Malay) the third day hence
- xun (Chinese) a period of ten days (in a month) or a decade (in someone’s life)
- jam karet (Indonesian) rubber time (an indication that meetings may not necessarily start on time)

Can’t say exactly when

In Hindi, the word for yesterday, kal, is the same as that for tomorrow (only the tense of the attached verb tells you which). And in Punjabi parson means either the day before yesterday or the day after tomorrow.

Time of day

Around the world different cultures have created highly specific loosely clock-related vocabulary that divides up the day. The Zarma people of Western Africa use wete to cover mid-morning (between nine and ten); the Chinese
Wushi is from eleven to one; and the Hausa (of Nigeria) azahar takes in the period from one-thirty to around three. The Samoan word afiafi covers both late afternoon and evening, from about 5 p.m. till dark. They call the period right after sunset afiafi po; this is then followed after a couple of hours by po, the dead of night. Of the various expressions for dusk, perhaps the most evocative is the French entre chien et loup – literally, between the dog and the wolf.

Elefenses

Dutch (and other Germanic languages) confusingly uses half twaalf for 11.30. While in Africa they are more long-winded for this specific time of day:

- baguo gbelleng pie ne yeni par miti lezare ne pie (Dagaari Dioula, Burkina Faso)
- isikhathi yisigamu emva kwehora leshumi nanye (Zulu)
- metsoto e mashome a meraro ka mora hora ya leshome le motso e mong (Sesotho, Southern Africa)

Shouting the distance

Krosa is Sanskrit for a cry, and thus has come to mean the distance over which a man’s call can be heard, roughly two miles. In the central forests of Sri Lanka calculations of distance are also made by sound: a dog’s bark indicates a quarter of a mile; a cock’s crow something more; and a hoo is the space over which a man can be heard when shouting the word at the highest pitch of his voice. While in the Yakut language of Siberia, kiosses represents a specific distance calculated in terms of the time it takes to cook a piece of meat.

Tip to toe

Parts of the body have long been used to define small distances – the foot in the imperial system of measuring, for example. The Zarma people of Western Africa find the arm much more useful: kambe kar is the length of the arm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger and gande is the distance between two outstretched arms. Elsewhere we find:

- dos (Hmong, China) from the thumb tip to the middle-finger tip
- muku (Hawaiian) from the fingers of one hand to the elbow of the opposite arm when it is extended
- sejengkal (Malay) the span between the tips of the stretched thumb and little finger
- dangkal (Kapampangan, Philippines) between thumb and forefinger

The Micmac calendar

The Michmacisimk language of the Micmac Indians is spoken by some eight thousand people in Canada and the USA. Their twelve months all have highly evocative names:

Caribou calendar

Similar charmingly named months make up the various Inuit calendars. January is siqinnaarut, the month when the sun returns; February is qangattaarjuk, referring to the sun getting higher and higher in the sky; March is avunniit, when premature baby seals are born: some make it, some freeze to death; April is natsijjat, the proper month for seal pups to be born; May is tirigluit, when bearded seals are born; June is manniit, when the birds are laying eggs; July is saggaruut, the sound of rushing water as the rivers start to run; August is akulliruut, when the summer has come and the caribou’s thick hair has been shed; September is amiraijaut, when the caribou hair is neither too thin nor too thick but just right for making into clothing; October is ukialliruut, when the caribou antlers lose their covers; November is tusaqutuut, when the ice forms and people can travel to see other people and get news; December is taujualuk, a very dark month.

Tea is a fundamental part of Chinese culture, so it’s no surprise to find that there’s an elaborate calendar relating to the growth and preparation of it:

Halcyon days

In 2002 President Saparmurat Niyazov of Turkmenistan decided to rename both the months of the year and the days of the week. Some months were to take the names of heroes of Turkmenistan’s past, but January was to become Turkmenbashı, after the president’s official name (‘Head of all the Turkmen’). In response to his suggestion that April should become known as ‘Mother’, one of his supporters suggested that instead it should be named after the president’s mother, Gurbansoltan-eje. The president heeded this advice.

The days of the week were also renamed: Monday became Major (main or first) Day; Tuesday, Young Day; Wednesday, Favourable Day; Thursday, Blessed Day; Friday remained as it was; but Saturday became Spiritual Day; and Sunday, Rest Day.

Revolutionary

Turkmenistan is not the only country to consider changing the months of the year at a single stroke. In 1793 the newly established French republic abandoned the Gregorian calendar in favour of a new, ‘rational’ calendar. It lasted thirteen years, until abolished by Napoleon in 1806.

Each season was divided into three months, and the name of the months in each season shared a common word ending.

- Printemps (spring)
- Germinal seeds sprouting
- Floréal flowering
- Prairial meadow
- Été (summer)
- Messidor harvest
- Thermidor heat
- Fructidor fruit
These months quickly became nicknamed by the British as Showery, Flowery, Bowery, Wheaty, Heaty, Sweety, Slippy, Nippy, Drippy, Freezy, Wheezy and Sneezy.

Stages of the Hawaiian moon

The Hawaiians in earlier times named each of the thirty nights of a lunar month. The first night was called hilo, to twist, because the moon was like a twisted thread. The second was hoaka, a crescent. The third was ku-kahi, the day of a very low tide. The subsequent days described rough seas, light after moonset or days suitable for fishing with a torch. On the eleventh night, huna, the sharp points of the crescent were lost. On the twelfth, mohalu, the moon began to round. This was a favoured night for planting flowers; it was believed they would be round too. The thirteenth night was hua, the egg; the fourteenth, akua, the night of the perfectly rounded moon. On the sixteenth night, mahea-lani, the moon began to wane. More named days of rough seas followed until the twenty-ninth night, mauli, meaning that the last of the moon was visible. Muku, the thirtieth night, literally meant ‘cut off’ as the moon had disappeared.

A time for celebration

njepi (Balinese, Indonesia) a national holiday during which everyone is silent

On reflection

Process of elimination

Not just words, but languages themselves change endlessly, some to the point where they go out of use altogether (on average one language a fortnight). Out of the (roughly speaking) 6,800 languages that comprise the global range, some recent victims have included Catawba (Massachusetts), Eyak (Alaska) and Livonian (Latvia). Many are from the jungles of Papua New Guinea, which still has more languages than any other country.

Others that run an imminent risk of extinction are: Abkhaz (Turkey/Georgia); Aleut (Alaska); Archi (Dagestan); British Romany; Apurina/Monde/Purubora/Mekens/ Ayuru/Xipaya (Brazil); Brapu (Papua New Guinea); Southern Chaco/Chorote/Nivacle/Kadiweu (South America); Diyari (South Australia); Eastern Penan (Sarawak and Brunei); Gamilaraay (New South Wales); Goemai (Nigeria); Guruntum (Nigeria); Iquito (Peru); Jawoyn (Southern Arnhem Land); Jiwarli/Thalanji (Western Australia); Khumi Chin (Western Myanmar); Sandaun (Papua New Guinea); Sasak (Eastern Indonesia); Lakota (The Plains, America); Maku (East Timor); Ngamini (South Australia); Rongga (Flores, Indonesia); Usapanteko and Sakapulteko (Guatemala); Takana and Reyesano (Bolivia); Tofa (Siberia); Tundra Nenets (Arctic Russia and Northwestern Siberia); Uranina (Peru); Vedda (Sri Lanka); Vures (Vanuatu).

Angry bumblebees

Most first names, if not derived from myth, place, flower or surnames, have a specific meaning. Patrick, for example, means noble, from the Latin patricius. Naomi means ‘pleasant’ in Hebrew, while the Irish Gaelic Kevin literally means ‘comely birth’. More unusual meanings of names from around the world include the following (m stands for a male name; f for female):

- Astell (m) sacred cauldron of the gods (Manx)
- Delisha (f) happy and makes others happy (Arabic)
- Ebru (f) eyebrow (Turkish)
- Farooq (m) he who distinguishes truth from falsehood (Arabic)
- Fenella (f) fair shoulder (Manx)
- Lama (f) with dark lips (Arabic)
- Matilda (f) strength in battle (German)
- Xicohtencatl (m) angry bumblebee (Nahuatl, Mexico)
- Xiao-Xiao (f) morning sorrow (Chinese)

Eyes like hard porridge

A number of particularly evocative names are to be found in different parts of Africa. Sometimes they refer to pregnancy or birth:

- U-Zenzo (m) things happened in the womb (Ndebele, Southern Africa)
- Anindo (m) mother slept a lot during pregnancy (Luo, Kenya)
- Arogo (m) mother nagged a lot during pregnancy (Luo, Kenya)
- Ige (f) born feet first (Yoruba, Nigeria)
- Amadi (m) seemed destined to die at birth (Yoruba, Nigeria)
- Haoniyao (m) born at the time of a quarrel (Swahili)

… to prophecy or destiny:

- Amachi (f) who knows what God has brought us through this child (Ibo, Nigeria)
- U-Linda (f) mind the village until the father’s return (Ndebele, Southern Africa)
- Nnamdi (m) my father is alive (when thought to be a reincarnation of his grandfather) (Ibo, Nigeria)
- Sankofa (f) one must return to the past in order to move forward (Akan, Ghana)

… to appearance or behaviour:
Chiku (f) chatterer (Swahili)
Masopakyindi (m) eyes like hard porridge (Nyakyusa, Tanzania)
Masani (f) has a gap between the front teeth (Buganda, Uganda)

… or to the parental reaction:

U-Thokozile (f) we are happy to have a child (Ndebele, Southern Africa)

Abeni (f) we asked for her and behold we got her (Yoruba, Nigeria)
Guedado (m) wanted by nobody (Fulani, Mali)
Anele (f) enough (given to a last born) (Xhosa, South Africa)

Silent foreigners

Czechs describe people from outside their country in intriguing caricature. Originally all foreigners were called Němek (from the adjective němý meaning ‘mute’); now the suggestion that outsiders are deprived of speech applies specifically to Germans, whose country is known as Německo. Hungary in Czech used to be Ubersko, and a Hungarian Uher, literally, a pimple.

The Italians, meanwhile, are called makaróni, for obvious reasons; while Australians are known as protinožci, meaning ‘legs placed in an opposite direction’, as they would be on the other side of the globe. Other cheerfully frank generalizations include: opilý jako Dán, to be as drunk as a Dane; zmízet po anglicku, to disappear like an Englishman; and when the Czechs really don’t understand something, they say to pro mně španělská vesnice, it’s all a Spanish village to me.

False friends handel (Polish and Dutch) trade liszt (Hungarian) flour berlin (Wagiman, Australia) shoulder

Skin and buttocks
Just for the record, and to avoid confusion abroad, here are the meanings of a variety of English names when written in other languages:

- adam (Arabic) skin
- alan (Indonesian) comedian
- alf (Arabic) thousand, millennium
- anna (Arabic) moans and groans
- calista (Portuguese) chiropodist
- camilla (Spanish) stretcher
- cilla (Zarma, Nigeria) basket
- doris (Bajan, Barbados) police van
- eliza (Basque) church
- eve (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) buttocks
- fay (Zarma, Nigeria) divorce
- fred (Swedish, Danish and Norwegian) peace
- jim (Korean) baggage
- kim (Ainu, Japan) mountain
- kylie (Dharug, Australia) boomerang
- laura (Greek) group of monks’ huts
- luke (Chinese) traveller
- marianna (Italian) accomplice who tells a gambler the cards held by other players
- sara (Hausa, Nigeria) snakebite
- sid (Arabic) plaster
- susan (Thai) cemetery
- vera (Italian) wedding ring

First person singular

Ben in Turkish, Ami in Bengali, Fi in Welsh, Jo in Catalan, Mimi in Swedish, Mama in Sinhala (Sri Lanka) and Man in Wolof (Senegal and Gambia) all mean I.

Speaking in tongues

British first names crop up as the names of languages, too:

Alan (Georgia); Ali (Central Africa); Dan (Ivory Coast); Dido (Russia); Karen (Myanmar and Thailand); Kim
And equally intriguing to English ears may be:

Afar (Ethiopia); Alas (Indonesia); Anus (Indonesia); Bare (Venezuela); Bats (Georgia); Bench (Ethiopia); Bile (Nigeria); Bit (Laos); Bum (Cameroon); Darling (Australia); Day (Chad); Doe (Tanzania); Eton (Vanuatu/Cameroon); Even (Russia); Ewe (Niger-Congo); Fang (Western Africa); Fox (North American); Fur (Sudan); Ham (Nigeria); Hermit (Papua New Guinea: extinct); Logo (Congo); Mango (Chad); Miao (South-East Asia); Moore (Burkina Faso); Mum (Papua New Guinea); Noon (Senegal); Pear (Cambodia); Poke (Congo); Puma (Nepal); Quiche (Guatemala).

Grand capital of the world

The capital of Thailand is abbreviated by all Thais to Krung Thep, and referred to as Bangkok, meaning literally ‘grove of the wild plums’. But, bearing in mind that there are no spaces between words in written Thai, its full correct name is:

Krungthephphramahanakhonbowonratanakosinmahinthara yuthayamahadilokphiphobnovpharadradchataniburiromudo msantisug meaning: City of Angels, Great City and Residence of the Emerald Buddha, Impregnable City of the God Indra, Grand Capital of the World, Endowed with Nine Precious Gems, Abounding in Enormous Royal Palaces which resemble the Heavenly Abode where reigns the Reincarnated God, a City given by Indra and built by Vishnukarm.

It rather leaves the Welsh

Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwillantysilioogofgoch

(meaning St Mary’s Church by the pool of the white hazel trees, near the rapid whirlpool, by the red cave of the Church of St Tysilio) in the shade.

A to Y

At the other end of the scale are three places called A (in Denmark, Norway and Sweden), and two more, in Alaska and France, called Y.
1. Getting Acquainted

bie shi rongyi; jian shi nan (Chinese) parting is easy but meeting is difficult

Hamjambo

However good or bad we’re feeling inside, we still have to communicate with each other. We come out of our front door, see someone and adopt the public face. ‘How are you?’ ‘Awright, mate?’ we ask at home. Abroad, greetings seem somehow more exotic:

- stonko? Muskogee (Oklahoma and Florida, USA)
- ah chop? Aramaic (Maaloula, Syria)
- oli? Koyo (Congo)
- hamjambo? Kiswahili (South East Africa)

‘Fine, thanks!’ we reply. They say:

- bare bra Norwegian
- dagu dad Adyghe (North Caucasus, Russia)
- bash Kurdi (Iran, Iraq)

How is your nose?

The Onge of the Andaman Islands don’t ask ‘How are you?’ but ‘How is your nose?’ The correct response is to reply that you are ‘heavy with odour’. Around the world there are numerous other ways to meet and greet:

- cead mile failte (Irish) one hundred thousand welcomes
- añjalikā (Pali, India) the raising of the hands as a sign of greeting
- inga i moana (Gilbertese, Oceania) to greet with open arms but soon tire of
- er-kas (Pahlavi, Iran) hands under the armpits in respectful salutation
- abruzo (Latin American Spanish) the strong hug men give each other whenever they meet
- lamuka usalali (Mambwe, Zambia) to greet somebody lying down on one’s back (a salute generally given to chiefs)

The Scots have a useful word, tartle, which means to hesitate in recognizing a person or thing, as happens when you are introducing someone whose name you can’t quite remember. They are not the only ones to suffer from this infuriating problem:

- ciniweno (Bemba, Zambia) a thing, the name of which one does not remember
- joca (Portuguese) thingumajig, thingumabob

Tongue-tied

That little dilemma solved, not everyone finds it easy to continue:

- byatabyata (Tsonga, South Africa) to try to say something but fail for lack of words
- vóvóhetáhtsenáotse (Cheyenne, USA) to prepare the mouth before speaking (for example, by moving or licking one’s lips)
- dabodela (Malagasy, Madagascar) one in the habit of opening his mouth so as to show his tongue projecting and rolling a little beyond the teeth, and yet not able to speak
- bunhan bunahan (Boro, India) to be about to speak and about not to speak

Chatterbox

With others you sometimes wish they found self-expression harder:

- láu táu (Vietnamese) to talk fast and thoughtlessly
- hablar hasta por los codos (Spanish) to talk non-stop (literally, to talk even through the elbows)
- mae hi’n siarad fel melin bupur (Welsh) she talks non-stop (literally, she talks like a pepper mill)
- hinikiza (Swahili) to out-talk a person by making a noise
- kumoo musu baa (Mandinka, West Africa) to jump into a conversation without knowing the background
- nudnyi (Russian) someone who, when asked how they are, tells you in detail
- chovochovo (Luvale, Zambia) the tendency to carry on talking after others have stopped
- gnagsår i ørene (Norwegian) blisters in your ears: what someone who talks a lot gives you

On reflection

What’s in a name?

First impressions are important, particularly to the people visiting a place for the first time. The name of the Canary Islands (Islands of the Dogs) derives from the wild dogs (canes) that barked savagely at the Romans when they first arrived on Gran Canaria.

Cities
- Cuzco (Quechuan, Andes) navel of the earth
- Khartoum (Arabic) elephant’s trunk
- Topeka, Kansas (Sioux Indian) a good place to grow potatoes

Countries
- Anguilla: from the Spanish for eel, so named by Columbus due to its elongated shape
- Cameroon: from the Portuguese
- Rio de Camarões, River of Shrimps
- Faroe Islands: from the Faroese
- Føroyar, Sheep Islands
- Barbados: from the name Os Barbados, the Bearded Ones: the island’s fig trees sported long roots resembling beards
Keeping in touch

Advances in technology have ensured that we are always on call, but whether that improves the quality of our lives is somewhat debatable:

- yuppienalle (Swedish) a mobile phone (literally, yuppie teddy: as they were like security blankets for yuppies when they first came out)

![Image of a person with a mobile phone]

- proverka sloukha (Russian) an expression used in telephone conversations, meaning ‘I have nothing special to say – I just called to say hello’ (literally, a hearing test)
- telebabad (Tagalog, Philippines) talking on the phone for a long time
- prozvonit (Czech and Slovak) to call someone’s mobile from your own to leave your number in their phone’s memory, without the intention of the other person picking up

Tower of Babble

Not that we should ever take communication of any kind for granted. At whatever pace, misunderstandings are all too easy:

- geop (Gaelic) fast talk which is mostly unintelligible
- berohina (Malagasy, Madagascar) to be spoken to in a strange dialect, to be perplexed by hearing provincialisms
- betenger (Manobo, Philippines) to speak another language with a pronunciation that reflects one’s own native language
- tener papas en la boca (Chilean Spanish) to speak in a stuffy or incomprehensible manner (literally, to have potatoes in the mouth)

False friends

Those who learn languages other than their own will sometimes come across words which look or sound the same as English, but mean very different things:

- dating (Tagalog, Philippines) arrival
- phrase (French) sentence
- dating (Chinese) to ask about, enquire
- Handy (German) mobile phone
Baloney

And sometimes people just speak rubbish anyway:

- hōpōhōpō (Finnish) nonsense
- prietpraat (Dutch) twaddle
- botalo (Russian) a chatterbox, a babbler (literally, a cowbell)
- poyipoyi (Tsonga, South Africa) a person who talks at length but does not make sense
- bablat (Hebrew) baloney (an acronym of Beelbool Beytseem Le-lo Takhleet: bothering someone’s testicles for no reason)
- ich verstehe nur Wortsalat (German) I don’t understand a thing you are saying (literally, all I hear is the word salad)

Q and A

Information is power, they tell us; but finding out what we need to know isn’t always as straightforward as we’d like. Sometimes we have to adopt special methods:

- candrā nā (Hindi) to make an enquiry with a feigned air of ignorance
- antsafa (Malagasy, Madagascar) enquiries about things of which one is fully cognisant beforehand

… although of course two can play at that game:

- gadrii nombor shulen jongu (Tibetan) giving an answer that is unrelated to the question (literally, to give a green answer to a blue question)
- kinkens (Scots) an evasive answer to an inquisitive child
- iqsuktuq (Inupiat, Inuit) to respond negatively by wrinkling the nose

Mhm mmm

So sometimes it’s ‘yes’ …

- mhm Lithuanian
- hooo Agua Caliente (California, USA)
- ow Amharic (Ethiopia)
- eeyee Setswana (Botswana)
- uh-uh-huh Tamashek (West Africa)

… and other times ‘no’:

- mmm Pulawat (Micronesia)
uh uh Shimasiwa (Comoros, Indian Ocean)
yox Azerbaijani
bobo Bété (Cameroon) doo-yee Kato (California, USA)
halo Chinook (North America)
pepe Chitonga (Zambia)
hindi Tagalog (Philippines)
yuk Tatar (Russia)

Just be sure you know which m(h)mm is which.

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

It’s all Greek to me

People fail to understand each other all the time it seems. The English idiom ‘it’s all Greek to me’ has counterparts throughout the languages of Europe. To the Germans it’s ‘Spanish’, to the Spanish and Hungarians it’s ‘Chinese’, to the French it’s ‘Hebrew’, to the Poles it’s ‘a Turkish sermon’. And, more unusually still, the Germans say ich verstehe nur Bahnhof I only understand station

The Human Condition

gé ru-wa nhagi mo choe

(Dzongkha, Bhutan)
the nose doesn’t smell the rotting head

Tightwad

However much we like to think that all those odd-looking, strange-speaking people around the world are different from us, the shocking evidence from language is that we are all too similar. Don’t most of us, whether we live in city, shanty-town or rural bliss, know one of these?

- hallab el-nammleh (Syrian Arabic) a miserly person (literally, ant milker)
- krentenkakker (Dutch) one who doesn’t like spending money (literally, someone who shits currants)
- kanjus makkchichus (Hindi) a person so miserly that if a fly falls into his cup of tea, he’ll fish it out and suck it dry before throwing it away
- yaalik (Buli, Ghana) sponging, always expecting help or gifts from others without being willing to offer help

False friends

ego (Rapanui, Easter Island) slightly soiled hiya (Tagalog, Philippines) bashful incoherent (French) inconsistent liar (Malay) undomesticated um (Bosnian) mind, intellect slug (Swedish) astute

Big-hearted

Fortunately, those are not the only kind of people on our beautiful and fragile planet:

- pagad (Manobo, Philippines) to show consideration for a slow-walking person by also walking slowly, so that he can keep up
- manâra-drimitra (Malagasy, Madagascar) to involve oneself in another’s calamity by seeking to extricate him
- eluud (Manobo, Philippines) to go deliberately to someone’s aid and share in his misfortune, regardless of the obviously ill-fated outcome
Ulterior motive

If only people displaying such fine qualities were always pure of heart. But the Italians are not the only ones who understand carita pelosa, generosity with an ulterior motive:

- mutakarrim (Persian) one who makes pretensions to generosity
- Tantenverführer (German) a young man of excessively good manners whom you suspect of devious motives (literally, aunt seducer)
- uunguta (Yamana, Chile) to give much more to one than to others

Obligation

Then again, sometimes the totally sincere can be altogether too much:

- Bärendienst (German) an act someone does for you thinking they are doing you a favour, but which you really didn’t want them to do
- arigata-meiwaku (Japanese) an act someone does for you thinking they are doing you a favour, but which you really didn’t want them to do; added to which, social convention now requires you to express suitable gratitude in return

Watching the English

In Greek meglá (derived from ‘made in England’) denotes elegance and supreme quality and jampa (derived from ‘made in Japan’) means very cheap. Other languages use rather different standards of Englishness in their idioms:

- s kliden Angličana (Czech) as calm as an Englishman
- ubbriaco come un marinaio inglese (Italian) as drunk as an English sailor
- filer à l’anglaise (French) to slip away like the English

Hat over the windmill

Rather than being a sucker who takes consideration for other people’s feelings too far, perhaps it would be better to be one of those enviable individuals who simply doesn’t give a damn?

- menefrehista (Italian) a person who has an ‘I don’t care’ attitude
- piittaamaton (Finnish) unconcerned about other people’s feelings
- i v oos nye doot (Russian) not to give a damn (literally, it doesn’t blow in one’s moustache)
- no me importa un pepino (Spanish) I don’t care two hoots (literally, I don’t care a cucumber)
- jeter son bonnet par-dessus les moulins (French) to throw caution to the winds (literally, to throw one’s hat over the windmills)
Number one

On second thoughts, perhaps not. For the line between self-confidence and self-centredness is always horribly thin:

- szakbarbár (Hungarian) a crank who can think of nothing but his/her subject
- iakićagheća (Dakota, USA) one who is unreasonable in his demands, one who keeps asking for things after he should stop
- kverulant (Czech) a chronic complainer, a litigious person
- hesomagari (Japanese) perverse or cantankerous (literally, bent belly button)

Warm showerer

The Germans have pinpointed some particularly egotistic types:

- Klugscheisser someone who always knows best (literally, smart shitter)
- Warmduscher someone who is easy on himself (literally, warm showerer)

Nose in the clouds

And it’s another short step from egotism to conceit:

- péter plus haut que son cul (French) to think highly of yourself (literally, to fart higher than your arse)
- creerse la ultima Coca-Cola en el desierto (Central American Spanish) to have a very high opinion of oneself (literally, to think one is the last Coca-Cola in the desert)
- nosom para oblake (Serbian) he’s conceited, puffed up (literally, he’s ripping clouds with his nose)
- khenh khang (Vietnamese) to walk slowly like an important person, to put on airs
- cuello duro (Spanish) a snob, stuck-up (literally, hard or stiff neck – from keeping one’s nose in the air)

Impressing

Almost as irritating as the conceited and the pompous are those who fail to see that, as they say in the Kannada language of Southern India, ‘Tumbida koDa tuLukuvudilla’, the pot which is full does not splash:

- farolero (Spanish) a show-off (literally, a lantern maker)
- m’as-tu-vu (French) a show-off (literally, one who constantly asks other people ‘Did you see me?’)
- Spesenritter (German) someone who shows off by paying the bill on the firm’s money (literally, expense knight)
- poshlust (Russian) ostentatious bad taste
- jor-joran (Indonesian) to compete in showing off one’s wealth
- elintasokilpailu (Finnish) keeping up with the Joneses
Sucking up

And yet, despite their obvious failings, both snobs and show-offs are often surrounded by the human equivalent of a benign parasite. As the Spanish say, ‘\textit{La lisonja hace amigos, y la verdad enemigos}’, flattery makes friends and truth makes enemies:

- \textit{chupamedias} (Chilean Spanish) a sycophant (literally, sock sucker)
- \textit{banhista} (Portuguese) someone who soft-soaps another
- \textit{digdig} (Manobo, Philippines) to praise a person for the quality which he lacks in order to encourage him to develop that quality
- \textit{jjirika} (Chichewa, Malawi) to curry favour by doing more than expected, but not necessarily well

Eejit

Can it get worse? Unfortunately it can:

- \textit{lū-lū} (Hindi) an idiot, nincompoop
- \textit{gugbe janjou} (Tibetan) a stupid person trying to be clever
- \textit{kaptsn} (Yiddish) one who does not amount to anything and never will
- \textit{eldhus-fifi} (Old Icelandic) an idiot who sits all day by the fire
- \textit{el senaforo de medianoche} (Venezuelan Spanish) a person no one respects and of whom everyone takes advantage, a pushover (literally, traffic light at midnight)

Salt in the pumpkin

‘It is foolish to deal with a fool,’ say the practical Japanese, though the Chinese wisely observe that ‘He who asks is a fool for five minutes, but he who does not ask remains a fool forever.’ Such observations reveal what the Catalans call \textit{seny}, a canny common sense. Others value such qualities too:

- \textit{ha sale in zucca} (Italian) he has common sense (literally, he’s got salt in the pumpkin)
- \textit{baser} (Arabic) one with great insight or one who is blind

Idiot savant

In Italy you are \textit{stupido come l’acqua dei maccheroni}, as stupid as macaroni water; in Lithuania, \textit{kvailas kaip žąsis}, as silly as a goose; while in France you can be as stupid as \textit{une cruche} (a pitcher), \textit{un pot} (a pot) or \textit{un chou} (a cabbage). But even idiots are not necessarily all they seem:

- \textit{adalahendry} (Malagasy, Madagascar) a person ignorant yet wise in some things
- \textit{Spruchkasper} (German) a fool full of wise sayings
- \textit{apo trelo kai apo pedi mathenis tin aletheia} (Greek proverb) from a crazy person and from children you learn the truth

Pregnant birds

Although the very young can delight us with their wonderful and surprising remarks, naivety is not, sadly, a state of mind that will work for a lifetime:

- \textit{creer en pajaritos preñados} (Venezuelan Spanish) to be credulous (literally, to believe in pregnant birds)
- \textit{yelang zida} (Chinese) ludicrous conceit stemming from pure ignorance
- \textit{lolo} (Hawaiian Pidgin) someone who would be glad to give you the time of day, if he knew how to read a clock
A piece of bread

How wonderful it is when we meet that rare person who just gets it right all the time:

- Katundu (Chichewa, Malawi) a person with outstanding positive qualities
- Lieblingsstück (German) the favourite item of a collection (said of someone special)
- Para quitar el hipo (Latin American Spanish) very impressive; astonishing (literally, enough to cure the hiccups)
- Es un pedazo de pan (Spanish) he/she’s a good person/it’s a good thing (literally, he/she/it is a piece of bread)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

* A leopard cannot change its spots

Chassez le naturel, il revient au galop (French) chase away the natural and it returns at a gallop
Aus einem Ackergaul kann man kein Rennpferd machen (Swabian German) you cannot turn a farm horse into a racehorse
Dhanab al kalb a ’waj walaw hattaytu fi khamsin galib (Arabic) the dog’s tail remains crooked even if it’s put in fifty moulds
Vuk dlaku mijenja ali æud nikada (Croatian) a wolf changes his coat but not his attitude
Die Katze lässt das Mausen nicht (German) the cat will not abandon its habit of chasing mice
Chi nasce quadrato non muore tondo (Italian) if you are born square you don’t die round
Karishkirdi kancha baksang dele tokoigo kachat (Kyrgyz) no matter how well you feed a wolf it always looks at the forest
Gorbatogo mogila ispravit (Russian) only the grave will cure the hunchback
3. Emotional Intelligence

wie boter op zijn hoofd heeft, moet niet in de zon lopen (Dutch) those who have butter on their head should not run around under the sun

Happy valley

Whatever kind of character we’ve been blessed with, we all still experience similar highs and lows of emotion. Pure happiness is a wonderful thing; and we should never take it for granted, for who knows how long it may last?

- kusamba (Ngangela, Angola) to skip, gambol, express uninhibited joy
- sungumuka (Luvale, Zambia) to experience transitory pleasure in the novel
- faly ambonindoza (Malagasy, Madagascar) delight before the danger is passed, premature joy

- choi lu bù (Vietnamese) to have round after round of fun
- alegria secreta candela muerta (Spanish proverb) unshared joy is an unlighted candle

In the coal cellar

The opposite emotion is rarely sought, but it arrives all the same:

- at være i kulkælderen (Danish) to be very sad or depressed (literally, to be in the coal cellar)
- lalew (Manobo, Philippines) to grieve over something to the extent that one doesn’t eat
- dastehen wie ein begossener Pudel (German) to look depressed (literally, to stand there like a soaked poodle)
- mal ikke fanden på veggen (Norwegian) to be very pessimistic (literally, to paint the devil on the wall)
- dar lástima (Latin American Spanish) to be in such a bad way that people feel sorry for you

False friends
bang (Dutch) afraid
blag (Haitian Creole) joke puke (Rotuman, South Pacific) to come strongly over one (of feelings) drift (Dutch) passion job (Mongolian) correct, good meal (Gaelic) to enjoy

Boo-hoo

Sometimes the best course is just to let it all hang out:

- kutar-atugutata (Yamana, Chile) to get hoarse from much crying
- gegemena (Rukwangali, Namibia) to mutter while sobbing
- sekgamatha (Setswana, Botswana) the dirtiness of the face and eyes from much crying
- dusi (Malay) to be perpetually crying (of young children)
- ā paddharm (Hindi) a conduct permissible only in times of extreme distress

Crocodile

Though even tears are never as straightforward as we might like them to be:

- ilonkyynelet (Finnish) tears of joy
- miangötigötim-böninàhitra (Malagasy, Madagascar) to weep in order to get something
- chantepleurer (French) to sing and weep simultaneously

Smiley

‘Cheer up!’ we tell each other. And hopefully this brings the right results:

- elmosolyodik (Hungarian) to break into a smile
- sogo o kuzusu (Japanese) to smile with delight (literally, to demolish one’s face)
- cuôi khi (Vietnamese) to laugh a silly laugh

On reflection

German Blues

The idioms of the world are full of colour. But in Germany ‘blue’ has a rich range of uses:

- blau vom Himmel herunter lügen to lie constantly (literally, to lie the blue out of the sky)
- grün und blau ärgern sich to see red (literally, to anger oneself green and blue)
- blau machen to take a day off (literally, to make blue)
- blau sein to be drunk (literally, to be blue)
- mit einem blauen Auge davon kommen to get off unscathed (literally, to get away with a blue eye)
- ein blaues Auge a black eye (literally, a blue eye)
- die blaue Stunde the time before dusk especially during winter (literally, the blue hour)

Tee-hee

Sometimes, indeed, more than the right results:
bungisngís (Tagalog, Philippines) one who giggles at the slightest provocation ngisngís (Manobo, Philippines) someone who cannot control his laughter latterkrampe (Norwegian) convulsive laughter mengare (Gilbertese, Oceania) a forced laugh, to laugh on the wrong side of one’s mouth tirebouchonnant (French) extremely funny (literally, like a corkscrew – as one takes in air repeatedly to laugh) méméstátama'o (Cheyenne, USA) to laugh so hard that you fart

No potato

In the Arab world they distinguish between those who are goodhumoured, damak khafeef, literally, their blood is light, and the opposite, damak tieel, their blood is heavy. But however wellmeaning, humour always carries the risk of failure:

pikun (Kapampangan, Philippines) one who cannot take a joke nye kartoshka (Russian) no joking matter (literally, no potato) jayus (Indonesian) someone who tries to make a joke which is so unfunny that you laugh anyway

Pulling your nose

The different expressions for ‘pulling someone’s leg’ reveal subtle distinctions in approaches to teasing. For the Germans it’s jemandem einen Bären aufbinden, literally, to fasten a bear onto someone; for the French it’s mettre en boîte, to put someone in a box. The Spanish pull your hair (tomar el pelo), the Finns pull your nose (vetä nenästä), while the Czechs go one further and hang balls on your nose (věšet bulíky na nos).

Worry-wart

But better, surely, to laugh at your troubles than live on your nerves:

běi gōng shé yīng (Chinese) worrying about things that aren’t there (literally, seeing the reflection of a bow in a cup and thinking it’s a snake) qaquablabnaqtuq (Iñupiat, Inuit) to be tense because of an impending unpleasantness doki doki (Japanese) the feeling of great anxiety when someone is about to do or doing something very nerve-racking hira hira (Japanese) the feeling you get when you walk into a dark and decrepit old house in the middle of the night como cocodrilo en fabrica de carteras (Puerto Rican Spanish) to be extremely nervous (literally, to be like a crocodile in a wallet factory)
No balls

We all aspire to zanshin (Japanese), a state of relaxed mental alertness in the face of danger; but for most of us our reactions are all too human when bad things really do happen:

- les avoir à zéro (French) to be frightened (literally, to have one’s testicles down to zero)
- ngua mat (Vietnamese) unable to stand something shocking
- khankhanana (Tsonga, South Africa) to fall backwards rigid (as in a fit or from extreme fright)
- jera (Indonesian) so scared by a past experience that one will never want to do it again

Spider on the ceiling

Then again, rather be healthily scared than driven round the bend:

- keçileri kaçırma (Turkish) to lose one’s marbles (literally, to kidnap the goats)
- avoir une araignée au plafond (French) to be crazy (literally, to have a spider on the ceiling)
- lud ko struja (Serbian) crazy as electricity
- más loco que un plumero (Spanish) crazier than a feather duster
- vrane su mu popile mozak (Croatian) he’s crazy (literally, cows have drunk his brain)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

A sandwich short of a picnic

- šplouchá mu na maják (Czech) it’s splashing on his lighthouse
- hij heeft een klap van de molen gehad (Dutch) he got a blow from the windmill
- ne pas avoir inventé le fil à couper le beurre (French) not to have invented the cheese wire to cut butter
- hu khay beseret (Hebrew) he lives in a movie; his whole life is like a movie
- non avere tutti i venerdì (Italian) to be lacking some Fridays
- tem macaquinhos no sotão (Portuguese) he has little monkeys in the attic
- udaren mokrom čarapom (Serbian) hit with a wet sock
- ikke at være den skarpeste kniv i skuffen (Danish) not to be the sharpest knife in the drawer
4. Social Animals

ui mai koe ki ahau he aha te mea nui o te ao, māku e kī atu he tangata, he tangata, he tangata! (Maori) ask me what is the greatest thing in the world, I will reply: it is people, it is people, it is people!

Most of us are sociable creatures, unable to avoid relying on those around us to keep us happy:

- bukaladza (Tsonga, South Africa) to dispel boredom by doing something such as paying a visit
- buren (Dutch) to look in upon one’s neighbours
- lishashamana (Lozi, Niger-Congo) the habit of running out to see anything that happens
- gezellig (Dutch) an atmosphere of cosiness, of being with good friends, and spending time together laughing and having fun; the kind of moments that create memories

Hermit

Better that than being the odd one out:

- lappsjuka (Swedish) a state of melancholy through being so isolated
- encontrarse como un pulpo en un garaje (Spanish) to be like a fish out of water (literally, to be like an octopus in a garage)
- nkunkula pansi (Mambwe, Zambia) an orphan who has no one to look after him and passes his time playing in the dust

Whacking aunt

When we do get together, are our conversations as morally improving as they might be?

- gigirhi-gigirhi (Tsonga, South Africa) to go from village to village exchanging gossip
- Klatschbase (German) a person who always gossips (literally, whacking aunt)
- ngasngás (Tagalog, Philippines) a scandal caused by gossip
- Bären aufbinden (German) to tell false tales (literally, to tie a bear onto someone)
False friends

sober (Estonian) male friend drug (Russian) good friend fun (Yoruba, Nigeria, Benin and Togo) to give host (Czech) guest
Party spirit

For some the urge to socialize can get the better of their wiser instincts:

- mawadishiweshkiwin (Ojibway, North America) the habit of making visits too often
- mit der Tür ins Haus (German) failing to take someone by surprise, to be too direct, to be too forward (literally, to fall with the door into the house)
- paglaguma (Tagalog, Philippines) the act of joining others in a party although uninvited
- paracaidista (Central American Spanish) a freeloader, gatecrasher; also someone who jumps into a discussion without knowing anything about the subject (literally, parachutist)

Storm-free shack

But then who can resist a really good bash?

- parapetowka (Polish) the first party in someone’s new apartment (literally, a windowsiller – as there’s no furniture yet)
- ipeje (Yoruba, Nigeria, Benin and Togo) an invitation to a banquet
- ponkal (Tamil) a boiling, a bubbling-up; a great festival in honour of the sun entering the sign Capricorn (the name comes from the cooking of the celebratory rice)
- eine sturmfreie Bude (German) a flat without the parents, thus allowing the children to throw a party (literally, a storm-free shack)
- nachspil (Swedish) a follow-up party
After-parties

In Japan, the second, sometimes spontaneous gathering that happens after you have left the main party is called nijikai. If you move on after a while to a third place, it’s called sanjikai.

Looking over the fence

Some guests are obviously more welcome than others:

- partigangare (Swedish) a fanatical partygoer
- laumaeläin (Finnish) a gregarious animal
- Zaungast (German) a guest who looks over the fence to get at least the music of the party (literally, fence guest)
- aguafiestas (Spanish) a killjoy, one who throws water on a party (literally, water party)

The sound of yoghurt

A little music often helps …

- kanariom (Yoeme, USA and Mexico) the first tune played or danced
- dorremifassolar (Portuguese) to play scales on the piano
- yaourt (French) English pop music sung without any understanding of the meaning; singing to create something that sounds like English pop music but actually isn’t (literally, yoghurt)
- accharika (Pali, India) to make heavenly music

Wiggle your bucket

… and then things can really kick off:

- gida (South Africa Township) to jump up and down constantly in one place (as a form of dance)
- menear el bote (Mexican Spanish) to dance (literally, to wiggle your bucket)

- chachula (Tsonga, South Africa) a dance with the rhythmic quivering of the body
- kundáy (Tagalog, Philippines) dance movements made by the wrist

Duck feet
Or not, as the case may be:

- hávêsévéhomóhe (Cheyenne, USA) to dance badly
- asiqtuq (Iñupiat, Inuit) nodding with the head while others dance
- pamutás-sílya (Tagalog, Philippines) ladies who go to dances but do not dance
- paton (Cuban Spanish) duck feet (i.e. can’t dance)

Keeping their bottle

Sometimes you just have to call in the professionals:

- binasohan (Bikol, Philippines) a dance in which three glasses partially filled with wine are balanced, one on the head and one on each hand
- danza de la botella (Paraguayan Spanish) a bottle dance in which each dancer balances a flower-filled bottle on his head
- gamadj (Ojibway, North America) dancing with a scalp in one’s hands, in order to receive some presents

On reflection

National anthems

The title of a country’s officially chosen anthem can be very revealing about its history: the Czech Kde domov mů j (Where is My Home) reflects many years of shifting borders and invasions. Other interesting titles include:

Burkina Faso: Une seule nuit (Just One Night) Israel: Hatikvah (The Hope)
Kurdistan: Ey Reqib (Hey Enemy or Hey Guardian)
Netherlands: Het Wilhemus (The William)
Norway: Ja, vi elsker dette landet (Yes, We Love This Country)
Romania: Deșteaptă-te, Române (Wake Up, Romanian)
Tuva, Siberia: Tooruktug Dolgay Tangdym (The Forest is Full of Pine Nuts)

Time, please

Always be wary of overstaying your welcome. As the Italians say, ‘L’ospite è come il pesce: dopo tre giorni puzza’, the guest is like a fish: after three days he smells bad:

- desconvidar (Portuguese) to withdraw an invitation
- il est comme un cheveu dans la soupe (French) he is not welcome; he has come at an awkward time (literally, he is like a hair in the soup)
- pudypaduya (Tsonga, South Africa) to go away because one is shown one is not wanted
- ngloyor (Indonesian) to go without saying goodbye
- apagavelas (Caribbean Spanish) the last person to leave a party

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Have your cake and eat it

auf zwei Hochzeiten tanzen (German) to dance at two weddings aam ke aam, guthliyon ke daam (Hindi) you can have mangoes and sell the seeds as well dikasih hati minta jantung (Indonesian) given the liver and demands the heart avoir le beurre, argent du beurre et la crémier avec (French) to have butter, money from butter, and the woman who makes the butter

non si puo avere la botte piena è la moglie ubriaca (Italian) you can’t have a full cask of wine and a drunken wife 5.
Having an Argument

casa onde não há pão, todos ralham
e ninguém tem razão (Portuguese) in a breadless home, everyone complains and nobody is right

Cold porridge

One downside to socializing is all the enforced jollity, often with people you might not choose to spend that much time with otherwise:

- metepatas (Spanish) a person who always does or says the wrong thing
- yokogamiyaburi (Japanese) an obstinate person (literally, to be difficult to tear paper sideways)
- elle coupe les cheveux en quatre (French) she is a difficult person (literally, she cuts hair into four pieces)
- kashi nye svarit (Russian) to be impossible to get along with (literally, the porridge can’t be boiled)

Being difficult

The German expression Fisimatenten machen, meaning to make things unnecessarily difficult, is a mangling of the French visiter ma tante (visit my aunt). It originates in the difficulty of imposing a curfew on occupied France during the Second World War. Visiter ma tante was the general excuse used by people arrested on the streets at night by French soldiers.

On the edge

Watch out for those snappy exclamations. They’re generally a sign of rapidly fading patience:

- kalter Kaffee (German) that’s old hat (literally, cold coffee)
- dang-geun i-ji (Korean) it’s obvious (literally, it’s a carrot)
Looking for the hair

And some people just can’t help but provoke you:

- bamp (Scots) to harp on the same topic constantly, to nag about the same thing
- chercher un poil aux œufs (French) to nit-pick (literally, to look for a hair on eggs)
- juubakonosumi o (yoojide) tsutsuku (Japanese) to split hairs (literally, to pick at the corners of a food-serving box with a toothpick)
- no tener pelos en la lengua (Latin American Spanish) to be very outspoken (literally, to have no hairs on your tongue)
- napleiten (Dutch) to discuss might-have-beens, go over old ground again, keep on arguing after a thing has been decided

Pig’s ribbon

Sometimes you can feel it all getting too much:

- la moutarde me monte au nez (French) to begin to lose one’s temper (literally, mustard is climbing up my nose)
- akaspa (Dakota, USA) to be provoked beyond endurance
- poner como lazo de cochino a (alguien) (Mexican Spanish) to jump down someone’s throat (literally, to make someone look like a pig’s ribbon)

Cracking up

We must, of course, do our very best to be tactful and discreet, relying on our wits to keep us out of trouble:

- mijery ārina an-tàva (Malagasy, Madagascar) not to tell a person his faults (literally, to notice a blotch on the face but not mention it)
- dar(le) el avión a (alguien) (Mexican Spanish) to say yes or agree, without really meaning it or paying attention (literally, to give the aeroplane)
- tumodisa (Setswana, Botswana) to shut a person’s mouth to prevent him from speaking
- ad-hoc-Bildungen (German) making up a new word on the spot in a moment of need
- adin’ andriana (Malagasy, Madagascar) a quarrel in which both parties show great respect for each other
On reflection

Hell is other people(s)

It’s always easier to describe unpleasant things or experiences in foreign terms; it makes them less immediate and it’s a good way of having a dig at another culture at the same time. When we can’t understand someone’s English we call it Double Dutch; while the Danes call a grey cloudy day Swedish Sunshine:

spaans benauwd (Dutch) lack of air when you are dead nervous (literally, Spanish lack of air) une querelle d’Allemand (French) a quarrel started for no obvious or good reason (literally, a German argument) kitaiskyi televizor (Russian) the manual examination of baggage at customs (literally, Chinese television) mandras kaip prancū zu šuo (Lithuanian) proud as a French dog avoir l’œil américain (French) to have a sharp eye (literally, an American eye) doccia scozzese (Italian) a shower that goes from very hot to very cold (literally, Scottish shower) schwedische Gardinen (German) prison bars (literally, Swedish curtains – the Swedish had a reputation for fine quality steel)

Mexican rage

Mexican Spanish has expressions for each stage of losing your patience with someone. Alucinar a alguien is to be fed up with someone’s constant and not very welcome presence; estar como agua para (pa’) chocolate, to be absolutely furious (literally, to be as hot as the water needed to melt chocolate); and finally parar(se) de pestañas describes losing it completely (literally, to stand on your eyelashes).

Picking a fight

The typically polite Japanese use few insults and those they do use tend to be indirect. Baka (fool) is a combination of the words for ‘horse’ and ‘deer’, with the implication that anyone who cannot tell a horse from a deer is obviously a fool.

Get lost!

Other cultures get straight to the point:

- vai à fava (Portuguese) go to the fava bean!
- sukses kuuseen (Finnish) ski into a spruce!
- ej bekot (Latvian) go mushrooming!
- skatertyu droga (Russian) table cloth to the road!

… especially in the Spanish-speaking world:

- banarse take a bath!
- buscar berros find watercress!
- freir bunuelos fry doughnuts!
- freir esparragos fry asparagus!
- hacer gargarasa gargle!
- a la goma as far as rubber stretches!

Dumb as bread
The rest of the world is not short of colourful verbal insults. ‘May the fleas of a thousand camels infest your armpits,’ they say in Arabic; and many other languages compare people to animals when being rude. In French your object of scorn is a chameau (camel) or vache (cow); in Swahili, a punda (zebra); while in Vietnam you call the offender do cho de, literally, you dog birth. Other expressions of abuse have clearly exercised the full imagination of the truly upset:

- du bist doch dumm wie Brot (German) you are as dumb as bread
- korinttilaivot (Finnish) an insult to describe the old (literally, currant brains)
- du kannst mir mal in die Schuhe blasen (Swiss German) kiss my arse (literally, you can blow into my shoes)
- du kannst mir gern den Buckel runterrutschen und mit der Zunge bremsen (Austrian German) you can slide down my hunchback using your tongue as a brake

Anger-hair

Now things are in danger of getting seriously out of control:

- tener una cara de teléfono ocupado (Puerto Rican Spanish) to be angry (literally, to have a face like a busy telephone)
- Gesicht wie ein Feuermelder (German) to be so angry that one’s face turns red (literally, a face like a fire alarm)
- mencak-mencak (Indonesian) to stamp one’s feet on the ground repeatedly, getting very angry
- dohatsu-ten o tsuku (Japanese) to be beside oneself with rage (literally, anger-hair points to heaven)
- mouton enragé (French) maddened sheep (said of an angry person who is usually calm)
- wasihdaka (Dakota, USA) one who gets angry at everything

False friends

- twist (Dutch) quarrel, dispute, altercation, wrangle
- batman (Turkish) thrust
- pee (Dutch) to be annoyed
- hot (Swedish) threat

The blame game

When the blood is boiling things can get increasingly complicated:

- togogata (Yamana, Chile) to turn one’s attention and anger from one person to another
- fijoo (Mandinka, West Africa) anger at someone other than the one who caused the anger
- babit (Malay) to implicate third parties in a dispute
- hewula (Tsonga, South Africa) to shout down one who keeps on arguing after the evidence has shown him to be guilty

Macho moment

Pray God, it doesn’t turn physical:

- imbang (Malay) reluctant but prepared to fight
- makgatlha (Setswana, Botswana) challengers who show their wish to fight by throwing down a handful of earth
- dii-konya (Ndebele, Southern Africa) to destroy your own property in anger lusud (Manobo, Philippines) to go into someone’s house to fight them parandhu parandhu adikkaradhu (Tamil) to fight by jumping and flying in the air langola (Mambwe, Zambia) to repeatedly throw a man very hard to the ground sugun (Malay) seizing the hair or throat to force down your adversary cisanan (Yamana, Chile) a canoe with an avenger of blood in it coming to exact vengeance

The female is the deadlier …

The Finnish have a wonderful word, knapsu, for anything that’s not male behaviour. Other cultures are quick to notice the gender-specific:

Stutenbeißen (German) the special behaviour of women in a rivalry situation (literally, mare biting) dzinana (Tsonga, South Africa) to pummel one another with the side of the fists, away from the thumb, as fighting women do) vongola (Tsonga, South Africa) to expose the buttocks (which is done by women as the ultimate insult when they run out of invective) agarrar(se) del chongo (Latin American Spanish) to brawl, to fight – applied to women (literally, to grab each other by the bun of the hair)

The flapping of wings

Whatever sex we are, we sometimes can’t resist having the last word:

kulumbana (Tsonga, South Africa) to follow a person who left a meeting in disgust and shout insults and reproaches after him dar patadas de ahogado (Latin American Spanish) to fight a losing battle (literally, to thrash around uselessly when you’ll drown anyway) alateo (Caribbean Spanish) the last words in a lost argument (literally, flapping of wings)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

The pot calling the kettle black c’est l’hôpital qui se moque de la Charité (French) it’s the hospital that mocks Charity bagoly mondja a verébnek, hogy nagyfejű (Hungarian) the owl calls the sparrow big-headed rugala se sova sjenici (Croatian) the owl mocked the tit il bue che dice cornuto all’asino (Italian) the ox saying ‘horned’ to the donkey ride ciob de oală spartă (Romanian) the splinter laughs at the broken pot al jamal ma yishuf sanamu (Arabic) the camel cannot see its own hump ein Esel schimpft den anderen Langohr (German) a donkey gets cross with a rabbit

The Rules of Attraction

a tola e à lettu alcunu rispettu (Corsican)
have no respect at the table and in bed

The Russian word for falling in love, oupast’, also means to be at a loss, to understand nothing. Other languages stress the magic of the early stages of the romantic encounter:

- koi no yokan (Japanese) a sense on first meeting that something is going to evolve into love
- ong buóm (Vietnamese) bees and butterflies, flirtations, love-making
- anhimmelin (German) to look enraptured at someone (literally, as if they were the sky)

No-pan kissa

On summer evenings, in little towns in Italy, young men and women fare la passeggiata, perambulating the central square sizing each other up and flirting, or, as they say in that country, fare il galletto, to do like the rooster. Other societies offer other options:

- blyazh (Russian) a beach where girls can be picked up
- kamáki (Greek) the young local guys strolling up and down beaches hunting for female tourists (literally, harpoons)
- no-pan kissa (Japanese) coffee shops with mirrored floors to allow customers to look up waitresses’ skirts
- tyčovka (Czech) a woman who hangs on to the pole next to the bus driver and chats him up

Like a motorway

In Indonesia, they have a word for falling in love at first sight: kepincut. But when it comes to what’s most attractive in a woman, there seems to be no accounting for tastes:

- rombhoru (Bengali) a woman having thighs as well-shaped as banana trees
- autostrada (Italian) a very slender girl without pronounced sexual attributes (literally, a motorway)
- e thamba (Oshindonga, Namibia) a big, fat and clean girl
- baffona (Italian) an attractive moustachioed woman
- at have både til gården og til gaden (Danish) a woman well equipped both at the front and the rear (literally, to have both to the courtyard and to the street)

Double take

Certainly, caution is advised in the early stages:

- layogenic (Tagalog, Philippines) someone good-looking from afar but not up close
- daburu bikkuri (Japanese) women who, as they are approaching a stall, look so attractive that they give the vendor a shock, but when they finally arrive at his counter they give him another shock as the scales fall from his eyes (literally, double shock)

A face only a mother could love

And one should always be wary of a blind date:

- kakobijin (Japanese) the sort of woman who talks incessantly about how she would have been thought of as a stunner if she had lived in a different era, when men’s tastes in women were different (literally, bygone beauty)
- kimangamanga (Gilbertese, Oceania) a person with a ridiculous walk and defective bottom
- sjöstyygg (Norwegian) being so ugly that the tide won’t come in if you’re on the shore (literally, sea ugly)
- skreuelelik (Afrikaans) scream ugly (i.e. so frightening as to make the viewer scream)
- être moche à celer des roués de corbillard (French) to be extremely ugly (literally, to be ugly enough to stop the wheels of a hearse)

Diving fish, swooping geese

In China, many hundreds of years ago, a poet said of the great beauty Hsi Chi that when she went for a walk fish dived deeper, geese swooped off their course, and deer ran into the forest before her beauty. Therefore, instead of saying a woman is as beautiful as Hsi Chi, in Chinese one simply says the four words ch'en yü, le yen, diving fish, swooping geese.

You beautiful creature

In other languages the comparison with animals may be even more direct. In Arabic, a beautiful woman is spoken of as having yoon al ghrazaali, the eyes of the gazelle. Similar metaphorical expressions abound:

- miyulesa (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a woman with eyes like a deer’s
- omirighligh (Khakas, Siberia) a person having a beautiful bearing in the same way that a horse has a strong chest
- kati-kehari (Hindi) having the waist of an elegant lion (used of an attractive woman)

And what do women want?

The men of the Wodaabe (a nomadic tribe of Central and East Africa) perform the yaake, a competition of charm and personality judged by young women. Performing the yaake, a man who can hold one eye still and roll the other is considered particularly alluring by the judges.

- karlakarl (Swedish) a real man
- bellone (Italian) a hunk who’s rather too pleased with himself
- tarzan (Hebrew) a dandy
- armoire à glace (French) a great hulking brute (literally, a wardrobe of ice cream)
Double Valentine

In Japan, Valentine’s Day is celebrated on two different dates: 14 February, when girls are allowed to express their love to boys by presenting chocolate; and 14 March, known as White Day, when the male has to return the gift he received. Chocolates given sincerely on these days are honmei-choko, true-feeling chocolates. However, women are also obliged to give chocolates to all the men in their lives, meaning large numbers of co-workers, bosses, etc. These are known as giri-choko, obligatory chocolates.

My Japanese prints

The Hindi language has sandesh-kā vya, describing a poetic form where the lover sends his message of love and yearning to his beloved through clouds or birds. The Mailu language of Papua New Guinea has oriori, a boy’s song to attract a girl. Aspiring Western Romeos often prefer a more basic approach:

- war dein Vater ein Dieb? Weil er die Sterne vom Himmel gestohlen hat um sie dir in die Augen zu setzen (German) Was your father a thief? Because he stole the stars from the sky and put them in your eyes
- scusa, baci gli sconosciuti? No? Allora, mi presento … (Italian) Excuse me, do you kiss strangers? No? Well, let me introduce myself …
- venez voir mes estampes japonaises (French) Why don’t you come up and see my Japanese prints

Hit by a basket

Not all approaches are necessarily welcome:

- echar(le) los perros a alguien (Latin American Spanish) to flirt with, make a pass at someone (literally, to set the dogs on someone)
- oshi no itte (Japanese) to pursue someone aggressively; to not take no for an answer (literally, pushing and pushing alone)
- dostat košem (Czech) to flirt with or hit on somebody who isn’t interested and turns you down (literally, to be hit by a basket)
- dikupu (Setswana, Botswana) stubs or stumps of hands or legs (said teasingly by women to a man who shows no interest in them)

Octopussy

And there are some guys who just don’t get the message at all:

- atracador (Latin American Spanish) a person who feels up a woman; someone whose sexual advances are heavy-handed and unwelcome (literally, mugger)
- ozhappu edukkaradhu (Tamil) an act of sexual harassment perpetrated against female passengers in a crowded bus or train
- el pulpo (Spanish) someone who is ‘all hands’, who likes to touch women inappropriately (literally, octopus)

Gooseberry

However well or badly it’s going, in matters of romance, two’s company, but three is very definitely a crowd:

- tocar el violin (Chilean Spanish) a person who uncomfortably accompanies an amorous couple (literally, to play the violin)
- segurando a vela (Portuguese) to be the third wheel on a date (literally, holding the candle)

False friends

- sleep (Afrikaans) girlfriend or boyfriend
- titì (Tagalog, Philippines) penis
- poluzzone (Italian) semen
- Puff (German) brothel
- spunk (Scots) a spark of fire
- bite (French) penis
- chain (Yiddish) charm

See-you-home wolf

Beware those for whom the habit has become more important than the object:

- Schuerzenjaeger (German) someone who chases after women (literally, a hunter of aprons)
- amoureux d’une chèvre coiffée (French) a man who is attracted to every woman he sees (literally, a lover of a goat whose fur is combed)
- buaya darat (Indonesian) a man who fools women into thinking he’s a very faithful lover when in fact he goes out with many different women at the same time (literally, land crocodile)
- okuri-okami (Japanese) a man who feigns thoughtfulness by offering to see a girl home only to try to molest her once he gets in the door (literally, a see-you-home wolf)

- tlazolmiiztli (Aztec) the stench which emanates from adulterers

No sweat

For the less sophisticated, courtship can be full of confusing obstacles and hard work:
• castigar (Latin American Spanish) purposely to ignore your boyfriend or girlfriend in order to heighten their yearning for you
• janeleiro (Portuguese) said of one who spends a lot of time at the front window, especially a young woman who is something of a coquette
• talisuyò (Tagalog, Philippines) the work done by a man to win a lady’s hand
• shvitzer (Yiddish) someone who sweats a lot (especially a nervous seducer)
• otenkiya (Japanese) someone who blows hot and cold (literally, weatherman)

Peppery-hot

So we can only hope that sincere feeling will win the day:

• cay (Vietnamese) to be peppery-hot; to have a passion for
• an jemandem einen Affen gefressen haben (German) to be infatuated with someone (literally, to have eaten a monkey in someone)
• ciğerimin köşesinden (Turkish) to love someone from the bottom of your heart (literally, from the corner of your liver)
• avoir des atomes crochus (French) to really hit it off (literally, to have hooked atoms)

Mouth relaxation

Comes the magic moment when the mental can at last become physical:

• oxsanistïr (Khakas, Siberia) to let oneself be kissed
• conk (Hindi) the imprint of a kiss
• smirikin (Scots) a stolen kiss
• şap şap öpmek (Turkish) to kiss by making a smacking noise with the lips
• csókolgat (Hungarian) to shower with kisses
• cupang (Indonesian) a love bite (literally, Siamese fighting fish)

Spider feet

Then how easy life can be:

• afilar (Argentinian Spanish) to chat with your sweetheart
• gemas (Indonesian) a feeling of finding something or somebody so cute that you want to squeeze or pinch it
• cafuné (Brazilian Portuguese) the loving, tender running of one’s fingers through the hair of one’s mate (from the act of a favoured slave who picked lice out of the slavemaster’s child’s hair)
• cwutch (Welsh) to hug and snuggle up in a loving way
• faire des pattes d’araignée (French) to touch lightly with the fingertips (literally, to make spider feet)

The Paraguayan way

One thing leads to another and soon events move to a whole new level. As the Russians say, ‘Snyavshi shtany, po volosam ne gladyat’, once you’ve taken off your pants it’s too late to look at your hair:

• zulana (Mambwe, Zambia) to undress one another
• lapóng (Tagalog, Philippines) sexual foreplay with the breasts
• ikibari (Japanese) a lively needle, if a man is willing but under-endowed
• Notstandt (German) an emergency erection
• hacerlo a la paraguaya (Chilean Spanish) to have sex standing up (literally, the Paraguayan way)
• voir la feuille à l’envers (French) to have sex under a tree (literally, to see the leaf from underneath)
• rabu hoteru (Japanese) hotels especially for making love
The little death

The Maguindanaon language of the Philippines uses the same word, lembu, to describe both an orgasm and the fat of animals, whereas descriptions in other languages dwell on the intensity of the experience:

- şiddeti heyecan (Turkish) literally, drastic excitement
- höchste Wallung (German) literally, maximum bubbling

Secrets and lies

Such compelling activity brings with it, in some societies, a whole new set of excitements and problems:

- Fensterln (German) the act of climbing a ladder to a woman’s window, bypassing the parents and chaperones, to have sex in the night
- besengkayau (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) to hang by the hands from a beam and move along it hand over hand (done by young men courting at night to avoid walking on the springy and creaking floor)
- miàla màndry (Malagasy, Madagascar) to spend the night away from home and yet be back in the early morning as if never having been away
- un petit cinq-à-sept (French) a quick five to seven o’clock (an afternoon quickie with your lover before going home to your spouse)

On reflection

In Rome love will come to you suddenly

Palindromes – words and sentences that read the same forwards and backwards – have been popular since ancient times. The Germans have even come up with a palindromic word – Eibohphobie – that means a fear of palindromes:

- a dyma’r addewid diweddar am y da (Welsh) and here is the recent promise about the livestock
- socorram-me, subi no onibus em Marrocos (Portuguese) help me I took a bus in Morocco
- Selmas lakserode garagedore skal samles (Danish) Selma’s salmon red garage doors must be assembled
- ein Neger mit Gazelle zagt im Regen nie (German) a Negro with a gazelle never despairs in the rain
- Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor (Latin) in Rome love will come to you suddenly

Thanks for the treat

In Japan, norokeru means to boast in an annoying way about your great relationship, while gochisosama is a sarcastic reply (literally, thanks for the treat). But good, bad or too-perfect-to-be-true, in reality relationships come in all varieties:

- sarbo (Dutch) a person who regularly sleeps with the same partner while living separately
- nanoua (Gilbertese, Oceania) a heart divided between two loves
- kutzwagers (Dutch) two or more men who have slept with the same woman
- stroitel’ (Russian) a man who likes to have sex with two women at the same time

Fried fish enthusiasm

The Germans have come up with some very useful descriptions of the nuances of modern love:

- die Bettgeschichte a one-night stand (literally, bedtime story)
- das Bratkartoffelverhältnis someone who cooks and cleans in exchange for occasional affection (literally, home-fries affair)

- Lückenfüller the person one dates between two serious relationships (literally, hole-filler)
- Backfischschwärmerei the crush young teenage girls get for older men (literally, fried fish enthusiasm)

Faded tomatoes

Relationships come in all lengths too. If it’s not going to end in marriage or a seemly long-term partnership without legal ties, there inevitably must come the brutal moment when one has to tell the other that things are no longer rosy in the garden of love:

- Trennungsagentur (German) a man hired by women to break the news to their men that they are dumped (literally, separation agent)
- dejar clavado a alguien (Spanish) to dump someone, to stand them up (literally, to leave someone nailed)
- dostat kopačky (Czech) to be dumped (literally, to get football boots)
- dar calabazas (Spanish) to jilt, ignore or stand someone up; to reject a marriage proposal (literally, to give pumpkins)
- il due di picche (Italian) to be dumped (literally, the two of spades, as in the card you are given)
- proshla mlyubov’ zavyali pomidory (Russian) the love affair is over (literally, love is gone, the tomatoes have faded)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Once bitten, twice shy

- el gato escaldado del agua caliente huye (Spanish) the cat that has been scalded runs away from hot water
- sütten ağizi yanan yoğurdu üfleyerek yer (Turkish) if hot milk burns your mouth, you’ll blow the yoghurt before you eat it
- brændt barn skyer ilden (Danish) a burned child is shy of fire
- puganaya vorona kusta/telezhnogo skripa/sobstvennoj teni/boitsya (Russian) a spooked crow is afraid of a bush/a carriage wheel’s squeak/its own shadow
- mtafunwa na nyoka akiona unyasi hushuka (Swahili) one who has been bitten by a snake startles at a reed
- cão picado por cobra, tem medo de lingüiça (Portuguese) a dog that has been bitten by a snake fears sausages

Family Ties

žena se plaši prvog muža, a muž se plaši druge žene (Serbian) a wife is frightened of her first husband;
a husband is frightened of his second wife

Matchmaking

Until relatively recently in the West, open relationships of a premarital kind were not the norm. The Dutch described unmarried couples who lived together as hokken, literally, living in a pigsty together. In many other parts of the world such a set-up still wouldn’t even be considered. The aim of society is to get a man and woman up the aisle, round the fire, or over the threshold:

- gökyüzünde düğün var deseler, kadınlardan merdiven kurmaya kalkar (Turkish proverb) if they say there is a wedding in the sky, women will try to put up a ladder

- giftekniv (Norwegian) a person trying to get two people married
- xem mat (Vietnamese) to see a candidate bride before deciding on the marriage
- dulang (Manobo, Philippines) to arrange an auspicious marriage, especially between members of two opposing factions in order to bring about peace
- sunkiya (Pali, India) the price paid for a wife

Objecting

Not that the young people in question always agree:

- tlatlava (Tsonga, South Africa) to refuse to marry the person selected for one by the family
- keštê’shâêtkê’ (Mingo, USA) to object to a marriage
- luyam (Manobo, Philippines) to hide one’s true intentions in order to throw someone off guard so that one’s real wishes can be carried out (for example, a girl who has resisted efforts to have her married then seems to change her mind so that she will not be watched, and she is thus able to run away)

Camel life

For women, at least, society could always hold the threat that they would end up alone:

- ningitihomu (Tsonga, South Africa) a girl that nobody wishes to marry
- momá’kó’éné (Cheyenne, USA) having red eyes from crying because one’s boyfriend got married to someone else
- kurisumasu keiki (Japanese) leftover Christmas cake (traditionally applied to women over twenty-five years old)
- quedar(se) a (para) vestir santos (Latin American Spanish) to be left unmarried (literally, to be left to dress figures of saints)
- radudaraifu (Japanese) single women who spend much of their weekends cooking food and deep-freezing it so that it can be reheated in a hurry when they return late from work (literally, camel life)
- gattara (Italian) a woman, often old and lonely, who devotes herself to stray cats

Old hat

In France the expression for an unmarried woman was even backed up by a festival. Coiffer Sainte Catherine meant to remain single after the age of twenty-five (literally, to put a headdress on St Catherine). From the Middle Ages, St Catherine has traditionally been the patron saint of young girls. On 25 November each year, girls would make beautiful headdresses to decorate statues of the saint. Unmarried women over twenty-five would attend a dance, wearing hats that they had made specially for the occasion, while everyone around wished them a rapid end to their spinsterhood.

Bare branches

However, since the implementation of the Chinese ‘one child’ policy things are changing in one part of the world at least:

- gagung (Cantonese) a man who has no woman because of the inequality of the gender ratio (literally, bare branches)

False friends

- chosen (Yiddish) bridegroom
- dig in (Armenian) wife
- fear (Irish) man
- he (Hebrew) she
- mama (Hindi) uncle
- self (Egyptian Arabic) brother-in-law
- that (Vietnamese) wife

Stalker

Of course, in all societies there have always been determined suitors:

- baling (Manobo, Philippines) the action of an unmarried woman who, when she wants to marry a certain man, goes to his house and refuses to leave until the marriage is agreed upon

• nusukaaktuat (Inupiat, Inuit) grabbing a wife, ensuring marriage by capturing her

Regular footing

There are all kinds of reasons why people want to tie the knot:

• se ranger (French) to get married for domestic comfort and put life on a regular footing
• ikabaebae (Gilbertese, Oceania) to be engaged from childhood
• damoz (Amharic, Ethiopia) a temporary marriage arrangement, usually for pay, between a man who is away on his travels and a woman who is his companion or cook
• casar(se) con hombre en base (Latin American Spanish) to get married when you’re already pregnant

Wedding lists

Female relatives of the Swahili groom perform a ritual called kupeka begi (send a bag) in which they bring to the bride gifts from her husband. In response, the bride’s female relations perform kupeka mswaki (bring the chewsticks), whereby they deliver to the groom a tray of toiletries. This is particularly important because the bride and groom are forbidden to meet before marriage.

The bride wore black

In the Tsonga language of South Africa qanda refers to the traditional bringing of an ox along with the bride as a symbol or guarantee of her future progeny. The ox is then eaten by her new husband’s family. She is not allowed to see any part of it; if she does she should say, ‘They killed my child.’ If language is our evidence, this is by no means the weirdest wedding event in the world:

• trá-hôn (Vietnamese) to substitute another girl for the bride
• faanifin maanoo (Mandinka, West Africa) a bride wearing black (signifying that she had sex with her future husband before the ceremony)
• ii/fuya (Ndonga, Namibia) strips of meat from the wedding ox wound around the arm of the bridesmaid
• infar-cake (Scots) a cake broken over the bride’s head as she crosses the threshold of her new home

Apron strings

Wives come in all styles:

• ntshadi (Setswana, Botswana) a dear little wife
• mon cinquante-pour-cent (French) wife (literally, my fifty per cent)
• sokozuma (Japanese) a woman who settles for a so-so marriage just to get it out of the way
• minekokon (Japanese) a woman who gives up a high-powered job in the city for a dull life in the country with a quiet husband

As do husbands:

• mandilon (Mexican Spanish) a hen-pecked, oppressed husband (from mandil meaning apron)
• strowin (Bengali) a married man who does everything and anything his wife says
• tøffelhelt (Norwegian) someone who has nothing to say in a marriage or at home (literally, slipper hero)
• mariteddu tamant’è un ditu lèddu voli essa rivaritu (Corsican proverb) a husband must be respected, even if he’s very short
Green hat

We can only hope that neither of them has an urge to misbehave:

- piniscar la uva (Chilean Spanish) to seduce a woman who’s already taken (literally, to grab the grape)
- fanifikifihan (Malagasy, Madagascar) a charm for making another man’s wife disliked by her husband, or the husband by the wife
- dài lümào (Chinese) implies that someone’s wife is unfaithful (literally, wearing a green hat)
- kentenga (Tsonga, South Africa) to find oneself suddenly without some vital item (said of a man whose only wife has run away, or when the roof of a hut has blown off)

Recognized

Though sometimes such potentially destructive liaisons can be defused by being formalized:

- kutua-na (Yamaná, Chile) to give the second wife the place of the first in the wigwam
- cicisbeo (Italian) an acknowledged lover of a married woman
- chandek (Malay) a recognized concubine of a prince (as distinct from gundek, an inferior wife, or jamah-jamahan, a casual mistress)
- antis (Manobo, Philippines) a father’s action, after his daughter’s adultery, when he gives his son-in-law another daughter as a second wife

Three’s a crowd

In some societies, of course, monogamy doesn’t even exist as an ideal, throwing up a whole new set of complications:

- lefuva (Setswana, Botswana) the jealousy between the wives of one man
- elungan (Manobo, Philippines) to divide one’s time equally between two wives who live in separate households
- gintawan (Manobo, Philippines) the energy and industry of the first wife (when her husband takes an additional wife) as a result of the competition from the second wife
- allupaareik (Inupiat, Inuit) the return of a woman after a wife exchange

Hope springs eternal

In these days of rikonmiminenzo (Japanese), the divorce-promotion generation, things are never that simple in any case:

- manântom-bády (Malagasy, Madagascar) to put away a wife without divorcing her altogether
- gila talak (Malay) a husband or wife who are divorced yet wishing very much to reunite
- ebpamituanen (Maguindanaon, Philippines) a divorced person who keeps their figure in the hope of a future marriage
- china buta (Malay) the intermediate husband a divorced Muslim woman must have before remarriage to her original husband

On reflection

Workbox or housewife

Various languages have words with surprising double meanings, creating some thought-provoking associations:
Relative values

Let’s look on the bright side. Though often derided in our fickle age, family life can bring many and varied benefits:

- agusto (Latin American Spanish) the cosiness felt when snuggling with a relative
- onimagu (Yamana, Chile) to feel such pity as relatives do towards each other when hurt
- ka-otaba (Gilbertese, Oceania) to preserve the beauty and freshness of a daughter-in-law
- dyadya (Russian) a rich relative abroad, considered as a source of money (literally, an uncle)
- bombela (Tsonga, South Africa) to make free with another’s belongings (especially with those of one’s maternal uncle)

Dirt on the nest

Although those who hold up the family as the answer to all things are probably sadly deluded:

- butika roko (Gilbertese, Oceania) a brother-in-law coming around too often
- kyodai-genka (Japanese) a fight or argument between siblings
- mātrigaāmi (Hindi) one who commits incest with his mother
- Nestbeschmutzer (German) someone ruining the reputation of the family or community (literally, someone who puts dirt on the nest)
- rihorhabodo (Tsonga, South Africa) an irresponsible man who does not care for his family, but just roams around, generally in town
- wićawokha (Dakota, USA) a man who lives with his wife’s relations (literally, a buried man)
- bayram değil (seyran değil enişte beni niye öptü?) (Turkish proverb) there must be something behind this (literally, it’s not festival time, it’s not a pleasure trip, so why did my brother-in-law kiss me?)

Congo confusion

As every son-in-law knows, you’ve got to be very careful what you say about one particular family member. In the Lokele language of the Congo there is only a tonal difference (shown by the capital letters) between aSOolaMBA boili, I’m watching the riverbank, and aSOoLAMBA boili, I’m boiling my mother-in-law.

Auntie

In the Pakistani language of Urdu a woman is addressed in the following way:

- apa (or baji) by her younger sisters or brothers
- khalah by her sister’s children
- mani (or momani) by the children of her husband’s sisters ch’ hachi by the children of her husband’s younger brothers ta’i by the children of her husband’s elder brothers p’ huppi by the children of her brother bahu by her parents-in-law nani by the children of her daughters dadi by the children of her sons bhabi by her sisters-in-law and brothers-in-law patiji by her aunts and uncles sas by her daughter-in-law nand by her brother’s wife sali by the husband of her sister

Prodigal son

In Fiji, they observe the custom of vasu which gives a son certain powers over his mother’s native place. He may take anything he covets from the houses, tear down the fruit trees, and generally behave in such a way that if he were a stranger he would be clubbed to death.

Family tree

Of course, however much you try to escape the familial bond, there’s really no getting away from who you are and where you’re from:

- asal pagasal (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to trace family relationships among people newly acquainted with each other
- anestolt (Norwegian) proud of one’s ancestors progonoplexia (Greek) bragging about one’s ancestors
- kupu (Hawaiian) one whose ancestors were born where he himself was born
- kacang lupakan kulit (Malay) a man who refuses to acknowledge his background and forgets his family or friends once he has made a fortune for himself

Between the devil and the deep blue sea

telan mati emak, luah mati bapa (Malay) if you swallow it your mother will die, if you throw it up your father will die

estar entre a espada e a parede (Portuguese) to be between the sword and the wall

tussen twee vuren staan (Dutch) to be between two fires

byt mezhdu molotom i nakovalneyi (Russian) between hammer and anvil wählen zwischen Höhle und Fegefeuer (German) to choose between hell and purgatory se correr o bicho pega e se ficar o bicho (Portuguese) if you run, the animal will catch you, if you stay it will eat you eddyr daa stoyl ta toyn er laare (Manx, Isle of Man) between two stools your arse is on the floor

Kids

ogni scarafone è bello a mamma sua (Italian)
every mother likes her own beetle

Pragmatic future

When it comes to the prospect of having children, the Japanese have brought the vocabulary firmly into the twenty-first century:

- kondoumukeikaku the way in which some women over thirty-five have unprotected sex with strangers to have children
- nakayoshi ninpu (buddy pregnancy) describes the act of two women deliberately getting pregnant at the same time so that they can experience childbirth together (literally, pregnancy-now plan)
- shoshika a future society without children

Warped

From the moment a woman conceives, a new life has begun – for the one in the womb, obviously, but also for the mother. French metaphors take particular notice of her difference in appearance: she has tombée sur un clou rouillé, fallen on a rusty nail, and thus swollen; or, to put it another way, she has begun gondoler sur la devanture, to warp from the display window:

- ubháya-siras (Sanskrit) two-headed, a pregnant female
- ajamonarse (Spanish) used to describe a pregnant woman’s increase in size (literally, to be like a ham)
- proglotit’ arbouz (Russian) to become pregnant (literally, to swallow a watermelon)

Longings

She starts to feel differently too:

- dohada (Sanskrit) the longing of a pregnant woman for particular objects
- afa-dratsiaina (Malagasy, Madagascar) the condition of a pregnant woman who has eaten what she had a great longing for

A mark of frustration

When a Maltese pregnant woman has a wish, one should try to satisfy her, or else the baby will be born with a large mole on its face; this is known as it-tebgha tax-xewqa, the wish mark.

Paternity leave

In some African tribes the men will take to their beds for the entire duration of their wife’s pregnancy, while the women continue to work as usual until a few hours before giving birth. This is called couvade (from the French word meaning, literally, brooding or hatching). The men believe that they are cleverer and stronger than women and so are better able to defend unborn children against evil spirits. Prone in his bed, the husband simulates the pains that the wife actually undergoes. Following the birth of the child, he keeps to his bed and receives all the attentions which in other societies are bestowed upon the mother. Variations of this behaviour have been seen in such diverse places as Papua New Guinea, Bolivia and the Basque districts of Northern Spain and South-West France.

Those who comes divided

The Fon people of Benin are particularly enthusiastic about twins. All twins are regarded as separate parts of a single being so their birth signals the arrival of mabassa, those who comes divided. They also believe that some babies may refuse to be born. Just before birth, the elder of a set of twins is said to peek out of the womb to survey the outside world. If it determines that the world is unsafe, it returns to the womb to report to its sibling. The twins may then refuse their delivery. If one twin dies, a small wooden image of the deceased must be carried by the mother and cared for at all times. All gifts to the survivor must be duplicated: one for the living twin and one for the dead.

- kœmœ (Chewa, South East Africa) the firstborn twin
- embangurane (Kiga Nkore, Niger-Congo) twins of different sex

Breast water

Caring for a helpless baby has inspired some charming words around the world:

- komvya (Mambwe, Zambia) to feed a child with one’s finger
- namaonga (Gilbertese, Oceania) to taste a little portion and chew it for a baby
- ukkun (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) an expression of fondness used to infants when breastfeeding
- anoka (Malagasy, Madagascar) the perfect contentment in sucking or drinking (used primarily of children or the young of animals at the breast)
- ngibá (Tagalog, Philippines) a baby’s tendency to cry when held by a stranger

We will rock you

In Southern Africa they certainly have ways and means of keeping a baby quiet:

- kolopeka (Mambwe, Zambia) to appease a child, stop him from crying by amusing him
- vundzata (Tsonga, South Africa) to turn a child’s head sideways when on its mother’s back or when put to sleep
- pakatika (Mambwe, Zambia) to place one’s own child on the lap of a companion
- khan’wetela (Tsonga, South Africa) to rock a child to sleep on one’s back by nudging with the elbows
• halalata (Tsonga, South Africa) to throw a baby up into the air, at a ceremony of the first new moon after its birth
• wo-mba (Bakweri, Cameroon) the smiling in sleep by children

Babygrow

All too soon the little creature wants to go its own way:

• abula (Setswana, Botswana) the attempt of a baby to move when lying on its belly
• toto-toto (Setswana, Botswana) a term of endearment to encourage a baby to stand or walk
• a’matiti (Rotuman, South Pacific) to accustom a baby to cooler temperatures by taking it on a walk in the early morning
• dede (Swahili) to stand uncertainly, as a child just beginning to walk stands when not held
• sparkedragt (Danish) a pair of rompers (literally, kicking suit)
• kopisata (Yamana, Chile) to get thin, like a fat baby when it gets older

Draggling

Despite its best intentions, it’s still a long way from being independent:

• ma-ma (Car, Nicobar Islands) ‘father’, ‘daddy’, the child’s cry for its father
• po-po (Car, Nicobar Islands) ‘mother’, ‘mummy’, the child’s cry for its mother
• upuss-eata (Yamana, Chile) to draggle after one, as a child, a long line or anything tied to a string
• pobi (Buli, Ghana) to wrap or to tie a child on one’s back
• n-velekula (Kerewe, Tanzania) to swing a child round from the back to hip, preparatory to putting it down or feeding it

A desk job

In Malta, the baby’s first year is regarded as dangerous, so the first birthday – Il-Quccija – is a happy event. On this day the child’s future is suggested when a tray of small objects is carried in and placed on the floor. The baby is then put down and allowed to crawl in any direction it wants. What it picks up from the tray signifies its future. The traditional objects include an egg (bajda) for an abundance of happiness, a pen (pinna) for a desk job, some coins (muniti) for wealth, a ball (ballun) for sport, rosary beads (kuruna) for the church, scissors (mqass) for tailoring, a book (ktieb) for a lawyer, a hammer (martell) for a carpenter, and these days other items such as a stethoscope (for a doctor) or a CD (for a disc jockey).

Mother love

As the Nigerian saying goes, nwanyi umu iri o dighi ihe mere nabali o naghi ama, when a woman has ten children there is nothing that happens in the night that she does not know about:

• wahdećapi (Dakota, USA) the sympathy that is said to exist between a mother and her absent children, producing peculiar sensations in the breast
• songkom (Malay) to bury the face in a mother’s lap (as a child)
• xilandzalandza (Tsonga, South Africa) a child constantly staying close to its mother

Cuckoo

With all this vulnerability at stake, one can only pray for decent parents …

• kukushka (Russian) a mother who gives up her child to be raised by others (literally, a cuckoo)
- kaelling (Danish) a woman yelling obscenities at her kids
- Kinderfeindlichkeit (German) an intense dislike or disregard of children

False friends

- taxi (Greek) classroom
- Gymnasium (German) grammar school, high school
- son (Vietnamese) to be still childless

Daughter in a box

… but not to the point where they overdo it:

- onba-higasa (Japanese) a wealthy family’s pampered child (literally, wet nurse and parasol)
- curlingforeldre (Danish) parents who do anything to sweep the road of life ahead of their children to ensure that it is free of obstacles (literally, curling parents)
- hakoiri-musume (Japanese) a young woman who has always been protected from the harsh realities of life by doting parents (literally, daughter in a box)

!Daughter in a box

- ser flor de estufa (Spanish) overprotected, not allowed to become independent (literally, to be a hothouse flower)

Impossible child

‘The child who is one night old,’ say the Arabs, ‘has already learned to annoy its parents.’ It doesn’t stop there:

- lundaezi (Lozi, Niger-Congo) to walk in the manner of a disrespectful angry child
- riu’ (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) rushing about and getting in the way (especially of children)
- upuk’anaana (Yamana, Chile) to throw away anything cooked, as a naughty child might throw away a fish its mother gave it to eat
- bunget (Manobo, Philippines) as a child, to want something one can’t have, get angry and then refuse it when it is finally offered

Dolls’ house

Distractions must be found; and the Yamana speakers of Chile have several delightfully specific words to describe the making of toys for children and how they play with them:

- tukau-iyana to put a foot or feet on a doll or a picture of one
- utellana to make or put eyes in the head of a figure one carves or draws
- tumusgaia to put down with the face upwards, as with some dolls on a table
- kaiyena-na to play quietly, as a little child with a toy
• manax-soatekana to play with someone else’s toys

Junken a munken

But who needs toys when kids are so delightfully inventive anyway?

• goagoana (Setswana, Botswana) to shout at each other in play
• chottu (Tamil) a slap on the head with both hands in play
• ha-lo-po (Car, Nicobar Islands) to have practical jokes played on one
• junken a munken, a sucka sucka po, wailuku wailuku, bum bum show (Hawaiian Pidgin) a kids’ way of deciding who goes first: eeny meeny miney mo

Cheese head

The years race by; things seem to change so fast:

• propanach (Gaelic) a well-built boy, beginning to run about
• botshegangangatswane (Setswana, Botswana) little boys when still at a stage when they are unabashed by their nakedness
• kaaskop (Dutch) a very blond, rosy-cheeked child (literally, cheese head)
• timtum (Yiddish) a beardless youth with a high-pitched voice

On reflection

My sister’s toenails look like my grandfather’s.

From ‘Around the rugged rock, the ragged rascal ran’ to ‘red leather, yellow leather’, a key part of learning a language is being able to master its tongue-twisters. They are always decidedly odd sentences. One French example featuring the s sound focuses on food:

Combiens de sous sont ces saucissons-ci? Ces saucissons-ci sont six sous (How much are these sausages here? These sausages here are six cents.)

While a German tongue-twister that offers a lot of practice in the pronunciation of sch portrays a rather dangerous situation:

Zwei schwartze schleimige Schlangen sitzen zwischen zwei spitzigen Steinen und zischen (Two black slimy snakes sit between two pointed stones and hiss.)

Other favourites include:

Kuku kaki kakak kakak ku kayak kuku kaki kakek kakek ku (Indonesian) My sister’s toenails look like my grandfather’s.

Méla babka v kapse brabce, brabec babce v kapse pip. Zmáčkla babka brabce v kapse, brabec babce v kapse chcíp (Czech) Grandma had a sparrow in her pocket and the sparrow made a sound. Grandma pressed the sparrow and it died.

Als vliegen achter vliegen vliegen, vliegen vliegen vliegensvlug (Dutch) If flies fly behind flies, flies will fly like lightning.

Król Karol kupił Królowej Karolinie korale koloru koralowego (Polish) King Karl bought Queen Caroline a coral-coloured bead.

Saya sebal sama situ sebab situ suka senyum-senyum sama suami saya saya sehingga sekarang suami saya suka senyum-senyum sendiri sembari sembri saya (Indonesian) I hate you because you used to smile at my husband; now he likes to smile for no obvious reason when he is with me.

Far, får får får? Nej, inte får får får, får får lamm (Swedish) Father, do sheep have sheep? No, sheep don’t have sheep, sheep have lambs.

Kan-jang-kong-jang kong-jang-jang-eun kong kong-jang-jang-ee-go, dwen-jang-kong-jang kong-jang-jang-eun kong kong-jang-jang ee-da (Korean) The president of the soy-sauce factory is president Kang and the president of the bean-paste factory is president Kong.

Learning curve

Soon enough it’s time to start getting to grips with the ways and means of the adult world …

- kinder-vraag (Dutch) a childish question
- ABC-Schuetze (German) a pupil in the first year of school (literally, ABC shooter)
- skolplikt (Swedish) compulsory school attendance
- managōana (Malagasy, Madagascar) to go over a list of names to see if all are there
- ageographetos (Greek) useless at geography
- katapādama (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a lesson committed to memory
- chongak (Malay) to raise the head and the chin or to do mental arithmetic in class
- daoshu (Chinese) to count backwards
- sonkkopta (Korean) to count on one’s fingers
- mushtiya (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a fist, a closed hand (also applied to the behaviour of a teacher who withholds some knowledge from his pupils through fear that they may surpass him)

Target practice

… with all the unpleasant ordeals that that entails:

- quemarse las pestanas (cejas) (Spanish) to study hard (literally, to burn one’s eyelashes (eyebrows)
- nochnoe (Russian) late-night studying, as before exams
- acordeón (Mexican Spanish) a crib sheet used to cheat in a test or exam (literally, an accordion)
- ponchar (Cuban Spanish) to fail an exam (literally, to get a flat tyre)
- vo chuoï (Vietnamese) to fail an exam (literally, to slip on a banana skin)
- kvarsittare (Swedish) a pupil who has not been moved up
- suberidome (Japanese) a school one applies to in case one isn’t accepted elsewhere (literally, skid stopper)

Hanging out

What every parent fears is slynaldern (Swedish), the awkward age, when their once innocent and biddable child starts rebelling against their authority:

- kutu embun (Malay) on the streets constantly; young people who roam the streets at night
- hangjongeren* (Dutch) groups of teenagers with nothing to do but hang around in groups, making strange grunting noises at passers-by (literally, hanging youth)
- katoro buaka (Gilbertese, Oceania) neglectful of one’s parents or grandparents

Filial
The good parent can only hope that all their love and hard work is reciprocated:

- matteyyatā (Pali, India) filial love towards one’s mother
- tindi (Tsonga, South Africa) to express joy at seeing one’s parents (of children)
- chengqi (Chinese) to grow up to be a useful person

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Like father like son

- kakov pop takov i prikhod (Russian) like priest like church

Body Beautiful

kozla boysya speredi, konya – szadi, a likhogo cheloveka – so vsekh storon (Russian) beware of the goat from its front side, of the horse – from its back side, and the evil man – from any side

Mugshot

Our face is our fortune, they say, but some are undeniably more fortunate than others:

- chimmurui no kao (Japanese) a face that would stop a clock
- kwabbig (Dutch) flabby pendulous cheeks
- oritir (Anywa, Nilo-Saharan) wrinkles on the forehead
- papada (Spanish) a double chin
- boirg (Gaelic) a small screwed-up mouth
- busachd (Gaelic) the deformity of blubber-lips
- bemandromba (Malagasy, Madagascar) having a large and ill-looking head
- avoir un oeil qui joue au billard et l’autre qui compte les points (French) said of someone who is cross-eyed (literally, to have one eye that’s playing billiards while the other is off counting the points)

False friends

- ache (Bashgali, India) eye
- flint (Swedish) bald head
- glad (Dutch) smooth, sleek
- groin (French) snout
- honk (Armenian) eyebrow
- mute (Latvian) mouth
- pea (Estonian) head
- pong (Khowar, Pakistan) foot

Gobstruck

Of course it’s all too easy to spoil the appearance of what we’ve been given …

- vaaye-nokke (Malayalam) to stare at somebody with your mouth open (literally, mouth-see)
- gaillseach (Gaelic) a large mouthful which makes the cheeks bulge out
… especially if we’re putting it to good use:

- kecomak-kecamik (Indonesian) to move the mouth around when eating something or saying a prayer
- füjtat (Hungarian) to pant, puff and blow
- menggonggong (Malay) to carry something in your mouth
- ayapsun (Dakota, USA) to pull something out by the roots using the mouth
- raspakhivat’ varezhky (Russian) to drop one’s jaw in surprise or amazement (literally, to open someone’s mitten)

Lippy

With the fleshiest part of that useful opening, emotion can easily get the better of appearance:

- maiskuttaa (Finnish) to smack one’s lips
- bibidia (Swahili) to thrust out and turn down the lower lip as a sign of derision or contempt

Tsk tsk

In many parts of the world, the tongue is not used just for speaking or eating:

- tam-tac (Vietnamese) to smack the tongue as a sign of admiration
- mitimiti (Rapa Nui, Easter Island) to click one’s tongue as a sign of disagreement or of annoyance (tsk, tsk)
- auau (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to stick the tongue out
- lamz (Persian) rolling the tongue about the mouth to pick the teeth
- imel-es (Ik, Nilo-Saharan) to move the tongue in and out like a snake

![Image of a person smiling and another person with their mouth open]

Trouble gum

Americans talk disparagingly of ‘English teeth’, but England is not the only country in the world where dental radiance could be improved:

- kasyápa (Sanskrit) having black teeth
- kadadat (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) possessing only half of your original teeth
- wahdatepa (Dakota, USA) to wear one’s own teeth short
- si gwa pau (Cantonese) someone with buck teeth (literally, watermelon shoveller)

Smiling, squirting, stripping

The Italians say, ‘Teeth placed before the tongue give good advice’; and whatever your gnashers look like, you can always put them to good use:

- gigil (Tagalog, Philippines) the gritting of the teeth when controlling emotion
- n’wayin’wayi (Tsonga, South Africa) to smile showing the teeth
- ntseka (Tsonga, South Africa) to squirt forcibly through the teeth
- ki’it (Manobo, Philippines) to bite off something with the front teeth (as when eating corn on the cob)
• yigul-a (Yamana, Chile) to pull out stitches with the teeth
• ee-ti (Rapanui, Easter Island) to strip off bark or hard skin with the teeth
• dona (Yamana, Chile) to take out lice from a person’s head and squash them between one’s teeth
• dentilegus (Latin) one who picks up his teeth after they have been knocked out

Long teeth

When the French talk of aiming for the impossible, they say they are trying to prendre la lune avec les dents, literally, to seize the moon with one’s teeth; to be very ambitious, likewise, is avoir les dents qui rayent le parquet, to have teeth that scratch the floor. For the Finns, to do something unwillingly is pitkin hampain, with long teeth; while for the Spanish, andar con el diente largo, walking around with long teeth, means to be very hungry.

Copping an eyeful

‘The eyes are the mirror of the soul,’ say the Japanese, echoing an English saying. But often it’s the more mundane aspects of these organs that people worry about:

• xitsavatsava (Tsonga, South Africa) the involuntary twitching of an eyelid or eyebrow
• bitlisisa (Setswana, Botswana) a sore eye that has been rubbed
• kuseng (Manobo, Philippines) to rub one’s eyes with the back of the hand
• rabun ayam (Malay) poor eyesight, especially during sunset

Bewitching

As with the teeth, our peepers are at their best when they’re put to use:

• gwilgat (Breton, France) to watch from the corner of one’s eye
• langut (Malay) to look upwards longingly
• pangangalumbà (Tagalog, Philippines) a pensive look (with the head supported by the palm)
• ingikaranawà (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) to wink significantly
• vekaveka (Luvale, Zambia) the shiftiness of eyes, looking here and there with madness or evil intent
• temuna (Luvale, Zambia) to pull down an eyelid in mockery
• embila (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to pretend to be cross-eyed

Cyrano

The French say that ‘a big nose never spoiled a handsome face’, a charitable judgement, perhaps influenced by the many fine probosci to be found in that country. But others have more serious problems than mere size:

• khuranāsá (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) one having a nose like a horse’s hoof
• tapíl (Tagalog, Philippines) flat-nosed
• bapp-nose (Scots) a nose threatening to meet the chin
• ngongó (Tagalog, Philippines) one who talks with a twang due to a nasal disorder
• patināsikā (Pali, India) a false nose

Lughole

Big or small, flat or sticky-out, our final external organs on the head are also closely observed by our worldwide languages:

• anak telinga (Malay) the external gristly portion of the ear budálu (Telugu, India) the place where the top of the ear meets the head ukkanna (Pali, India) having the ears erect n’wii (Tsonga, South Africa) to have buzzing in the ears, as when under water parece Volkswagen con las puertas abiertas (Latin American Spanish) big-eared (literally, he looks like a Volkswagen with the doors open)

Grass belong head

In the Tok Pisin language of Papua New Guinea, they call hair gras bilong het. Such grass may take different forms, quite apart from appearing in all the wrong places:

- kesuir (Malay) hairy nostrils
- gejigeji-mayuge (Japanese) bushy eyebrows (literally, centipede eyebrows)
- giri-giri (Hawaiian Pidgin) the place where two or three hairs stick up no matter what
- mas (Hindi) soft hair appearing above a lad’s upper lip, heralding the imminent advent of youth
- kapúčchala (Sanskrit) a tuft of hair on the hind part of the head (hanging down like a tail)
- pédevádu (Telugu, India) a man upon whose face hair does not grow

Octopus monk

For many men age brings a related and inescapable problem:

- katok (Russian) a bald patch (literally, a skating rink)
- baakoodo hage (Japanese) said of a man with receding hair who combs what remains at the sides over the top of his head (literally, barcode bald, due to how it looks viewed from above)
- hlohwe (Tsonga, South Africa) a forehead with corners devoid of hair (applied to a person whose hair is receding)
- tako-nyudo (Japanese) a baldy (literally, octopus monk)

Oeuf-tête

The French, in particular, have a fine range of expressions for this challenging condition:

- avoir le melon déplumé to have a plucked melon
- avoir une boule de billard to have a billiard ball
- ne plus avoir de cresson sur la cafetière no longer to have watercress on the coffeepot
- ne plus avoir de gazon sur la platebande no longer to have a lawn on the flowerbed
- avoir la casquette en peau de fesses to have a cap made out of buck skin
- être chauve comme un genou to be as bald as a knee
- avoir un vélo drome à mouches to have a velodrome for flies

Well-armed

We have upper and lower arms and elbows, but the Swedes have a word for the opposite side of the arm from the elbow – armveck. Other useful words stress the practical uses of these appendages:

- kwapatira (Chichewa, Malawi) to carry something tucked under the arm
- cholat (Malay) to dig with the elbow or the hand
- athevotto (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to swing the arms, wave or clear away smoke

On reflection

Japanese birthdays

In the West, the birthdays that are particularly celebrated are those of coming of age: 18 and 21. In Japan, the older you get the more solemnly your birthday (sanga) is celebrated. The birthdays of especial importance are:

40: shoro, the beginning of old age, since Confucius said: ‘When I was forty I did not wander.’
61: kanreki, the completion of the sixty-year cycle; the celebrant wears a red cap and a red kimono and is congratulated by everybody for having become ‘a newborn baby once more’
70: koki, rare age, so called because the poet Tu Fu said that it was a privilege for a person to reach the age of seventy 77: kiju, long and happy life
88: beiju, the rice birthday

These last two birthdays gain their names from the similarity of the Japanese ideograms for ‘joy’ and ‘rice’ to those for the numbers 77 and 88 respectively.

Handy

In the Tsonga language of South Africa they have the expressive word vunyiriri, the stiffness of hands and feet felt on cold wintry mornings; while the Telugu language of India describes kamikili, the hand held with fingers bent and separated. However they’re positioned, their uses are manifold:

- apphoteti (Pali, India) to clap the hands as a sign of pleasure
- aupiupiu (Mailu, Papua New Guinea) to flick an insect off the body
- ka-cha-to-re (Car, Nicobar Islands) to hang down by one’s hands
- duiri (Buli, Ghana) to pass one’s hands over skin so that the hairs stand up
- pamamayáng (Tagalog, Philippines) placing the hands on one’s hips
- geu (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to thrust one’s hand into a bag

And two are even better than one:

- raup (Malay) to scoop up with both hands
- anjali (Hindi) the cup-shaped hollow formed by joining the two palms together
- chal (Car, Nicobar Islands) to lift up something heavy using both hands
- kaf faksara (Rotuman, South Pacific) to clap the hands with one finger bent inwards to make a hollow sound

Digital
‘Without fingers,’ say the Moroccans, ‘the hand would be a spoon.’ And where indeed would we be without our essential digits?

- gamaza (Arabic) to take with the fingertips
- gutól (Tagalog, Philippines) snipping with the fingernails
- menonjolkán (Malay) to push one’s fingers into someone’s face
- tstumi-oidagana (Yamana, Chile) to offer one’s finger or any part of oneself to be bitten
- sena (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) the time that elapses while snapping the thumb and forefinger ten times

Doigt de seigneur

In French, starting from the one nearest the thumb, you have index, majeur – biggest finger; annulaire – ring finger; and, last but not least, auriculaire – literally, the ear finger, because it’s the only one small enough to stick in your ear. But if your digits don’t stop there, you have to go to the Luvale language of Zambia for the sambwilo, the sixth finger or toe.

Expansive

In the Malay language, they use the space between the fingers for a series of useful measurements:

- jengkal the span between thumb and finger
- jengkul the span between thumb and index finger
- telunjok the span between thumb and the joint of the bent index finger
- ketengkeng the span between thumb and little finger

Classified

Further down the body, one reaches those parts generally described as private. In Southern Africa, they appear to have thought more than most about keeping it that way:

- phindzela (Tsonga, South Africa) to cover one’s private parts carefully
- tswi (Tsonga, South Africa) to expose one’s private parts by bending forward
- ikokomela (Setswana, Botswana) to look at one’s own private parts

Peppers and Parasols

The Japanese have a memorable vocabulary to describe their (male) genitalia:

- imo a potato, a penis that is short and fat
- tō garashi a red pepper, a penis that is small and pink
- gobō a burdock, a penis that is large and tubular
- kenke small, tight testicles (literally pickles)
- karakasa a paper parasol, a penis that is unusually top-heavy

Map of the world

French slang uses even more elaborate metaphors. A penis is either une anguille de caleçif, an underwear eel, or un cigare à moustache, a cigar with a moustache. In similarly fanciful fashion, breasts are described as une mappemonde, literally, a map of the world (spread across two hemispheres).
Bum deal

Round the back, it seems, we are free to be frank, especially in East Africa and the Philippines:

- shuri (Swahili) a person whose buttocks stick out more than those of the average person
- tuwad (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to make one’s buttocks project
- egkisu-kisu (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to move the buttocks little by little
- pinginyika (Swahili) to move the buttocks with a circular motion when walking or dancing

Milk bottles

When it comes to the legs, English has no word to describe the back of the knee. Irish Gaelic calls it the ioscaid, the Swedes knäveck, while the Native American Dakota language calls it hunyoka-khmin. Other languages are similarly descriptive about both the appearance and the movement of our lower half:

- euischios (Ancient Greek) with beautiful hips
- melkflessen (Dutch) bare legs which have not been suntanned (literally, milk bottles)
- kerchiholl (Albanian) having thin lower legs
- anyula (Tsonga, South Africa) to open one’s legs indecently
- hiza ga warau (Japanese) the wobbly feeling you have in your legs after dashing up several flights of stairs (literally, my knees are laughing)

Thin as a rake

When it comes to the whole package, there are differences of opinion about how substantial you should be. In general, the modern world applauds the skinny, even as our languages hark back to a less prosperous age in their comparisons:

- ser magro como um palito (Portuguese) to be as thin as a toothpick
- zo mager als een lat zijn (Dutch) to be as thin as a wooden latch
- po ru zhu (Mandarin) thin as paper
- flaco como un guín (Cuban Spanish) thin as a sugar-cane flower
- kostur slab (Macedonian) thin as a skeleton
- loksh (Yiddish) a noodle, a tall thin person

Bacon buoy

While fatties come in for all kinds of criticism:
- vuthikithiki (Tsonga, South Africa) body fat which shakes at every step
- juyaku-bara (Japanese) a paunch (literally, company director’s stomach)
- tivili (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a person with three dents in his belly (from fatness)
- foca (Spanish) a very fat woman (literally, a seal)
- yongzhong (Chinese) too fat and clumsy to move
- gordo como una buoya (Cuban Spanish) fat as a buoy
- abspecken (German) losing weight (literally, de-baconing)
- fai prima a saltargli sopra che girargli intorno (Italian) it’s faster to jump over him than go round him (because he’s so fat)

Illusory

Not, of course, that you can always judge from appearances:

- Sitzriese (German) someone who is actually quite short but looks tall when they’re sitting down (literally, sitting giant)
- edtiudan (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to pretend to be lame

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow’s ear

- rozhdennyj polzat letat ne mozhet (Russian) if you’re born to crawl you can’t fly
- on ne peut faire d’une buse un épervier (French) you can’t turn a buzzard into a sparrowhawk
- al draagt een aap een gouden ring, het is en blijft een lelijk ding (Dutch) even if the monkey wears a golden ring it remains ugly
- fare le nozze con i fichi secchi (Italian) to celebrate a wedding with dried figs 10.
Dressed to Kill

siku utakayokwenda uchi ndiyo siku utakayokutana na mkweo (Swahili)

the day you decide to leave your house naked is the day you run into your in-laws

A memorable smile

Whatever Nature has provided you with, you always have the chance to make your own improvements:

- sulong (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) to decorate the front teeth with gold (formerly brass)
- nyin-susu (Bambara, West Africa) to blacken someone’s gums for cosmetic purposes
- pen bilong maus (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) lipstick

False friends

Rock (German) skirt
veste (French) jacket
romp (Afrikaans) skirt
cilinder (Hungarian) top hat
gulp (Dutch) fly (in trousers)

Hairdressed to kill

And hair is one very obvious place for the drastic makeover:

- rikuruto-katto (Japanese) a short haircut supposed to impress prospective employers (literally, recruit cut)
- wu-masweeswe (Kalanga, Botswana) shaving the hair in a sinuous outline across the forehead
- emperifollado(a) (Latin American Spanish) dressed to kill, particularly when it involves a complicated hairdo
- Topfschnitt (German) a certain haircut that looks a bit as if the hairdresser put a saucepan on someone’s head and cut all around it (literally, saucepan cut)
Frigate

Make sure not to overdo it:

- cerone (Italian) excessive make-up applied on one’s face (literally, grease paint)
- ityyewaton (Dakota, USA) to wear anything that makes one look frightful
- age-otori (Japanese) formally styling one’s hair for a coming-of-age ceremony, but looking worse than before
- Verschlimmerung (German) an improvement for the worse
- die Fregatte (German) a heavily made-up old woman (literally, frigate)
- yubisakibijin (Japanese) a woman who spends a lot of her salary tending to her fingernails

On reflection

Ugly beautiful

Though there are hundreds of poetic English words for different beautiful colours, there are very few for those at the less pleasant end of the spectrum. The Ojibway of North America say osawegisan, which means making something yellow with smoke, nicotine-stained. The Pali of India have a word for the bluish-black colour of a corpse – vinilaka – which literally means resembling neither father nor mother. The Amerindian Mingo words for the basic colours are just as evocative:

- uiskwanyë’ta’ê’ the colour of rotten wood (brown)
- unöwö’ta’ê’ the colour of limestone or plaster (white)
- uyë’kwææ’ê’ the colour of smoke (grey)
- tsitkwææ’ê’ the colour of bile (yellow)

Berlin backsides

Just because you can’t see your own backside doesn’t mean that others can’t. The Germans certainly notice these things:

- Arschgeweih a large symmetrical tattoo on the lower back, just above the bottom, resembling the shape of antlers
- Liebestoeter unattractive underwear (literally, love killer)
- Maurerdekoltee a bricklayer’s cleavage (the part of a man’s backside you can see when he stoops deeply and his trouser waistband goes down a little bit)

Sails set

All over the world, people enjoy escaping from their intractable shape in a fine outfit:
- kambabalegkasan (Maguindanaon, Philippines) the act of wearing new clothes
- sich auftakeln (German) to get all dolled up (literally, with all sails set)
- housunprässit (Finnish) trouser creases
- fifi (Argentinian Spanish) a fashion-conscious man, dandy
- kopezya (Mambwe, Zambia) tipping his hat down over his eyes
- pagalong (Maranao, Philippines) to look at oneself in the mirror

Kangaroo teeth

Though what works in one place won’t necessarily work in another:

- nastā (Hindi) a hole bored in the septum of the nose
- wo-kūs’-i-ūk (Maliseet, Canada) a necklace of claws
- kechchai (Tamil) little tinkling bells tied to the legs
- wowoodtayadal (Kaurna Warra, Australia) two or four kangaroo teeth bound together with hair and covered with grease and red ochre, worn on the forehead by fully initiated men
- okpukpu (Igbo, Nigeria) an ivory bangle worn by women with ten or more children, and sometimes by men to demonstrate their proven expertise
- borsello (Italian) a man’s handbag

Hand-me-downs

‘Those who have fine clothes in their chests can wear rags,’ say the Italians, but in other parts of the world it’s not always true that the higher up you are in society the more likely you are to dress down:

- s chuzhovo plecha (Russian) second-hand clothes (literally, from a stranger’s shoulder)
- kamaeieia (Gilbertese, Oceania) to wear a garment until it is in tatters
- xúng xính (Vietnamese) to be dressed in oversized clothes
- mabelebele (Setswana, Botswana) the rags and tatters worn by a madman, a pauper or a traditional doctor

Designer knitwear

The two extremes of women’s intense relationship with clothes are chronicled by the Japanese. At one end there is nitto-onna, a woman so dedicated to her career that she has no time to iron blouses and so resorts to dressing only in knitted tops; and at the other there are ippaiyoku, women whose every garment and accessory are made by the same designer.
Fashionista

Most try to keep up with what everyone else is wearing, but there will always be some, thankfully, who remain gloriously independent:

- cowichan (British Columbia, Canada) a vividly patterned sweater
- buddi (Tamil) someone who wears thick glasses
- lambung (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to wear very big clothes
- agadagba (Igbo, Nigeria) men’s underpants woven from a mix of cotton, grass and tree bark
- arse gras (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) a bunch of tanket leaves stuck into a belt to cover a man’s backside

So village

For as long as clothes have been around, people have sneered or laughed at what others have chosen to wear:

- topewalla (Hindi) one who wears a hat, generally a European
- kampungan (Indonesian) someone who is incredibly out of fashion, outdated (literally, so village)
- hendsärmeleg (German) someone who behaves very rustically (literally, shirt-sleeved)
- ta-oiny (Car, Nicobar Islands) clothes-wearing foreigners
- samopal (Russian) home-made clothing sold under commercial labels (literally, a home-made cap gun)

Clodhoppers

Though hopefully not what they put on their feet:

- gällot (Sami, North Scandinavia) a shoe made out of hide taken from the head of a reindeer
- fittocks (Scots) the feet of stockings cut off and worn as shoes
- kirza (Russian) imitation leather boots
- innesko (Swedish) an indoor shoe
- jorg (Scots) the noise of shoes when full of water

Barely there

But then again isn’t one of the most enjoyable things about dressing up coming home and stripping off?

- huhu (Rapanui, Easter Island) to take off one’s clothes in one go, with a pull
- byambula (Tsonga, South Africa) to walk in the open completely naked

Just make sure that when you get dressed again there’s no confusion …

- vrenge (Norwegian) the action of putting right clothes which are inside out
- lopodutes (Ancient Greek) one who slips into another’s clothes
- terchausser (Gallo, France) to put the right foot into the left boot and vice versa
- embasan (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to wear clothes while taking a bath

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD
Don’t judge a book by its cover

ngam tae rup, jub mai horm (Thai) great looks but bad breath l’abito non fa il monaco (Italian) clothes do not make the monk quem vê caras não vê corações (Portuguese) he who sees face doesn’t see heart odijelo ne čini čovjeka (Croatian) a suit doesn’t make a man het zijn niet alleen koks die lange messen dragen (Dutch) it’s not only cooks who carry long knives

Stretching Your Legs

zemheride yoğurt isteyen, cebinde bir inek taşır (Turkish) he who wants yoghurt in winter must carry a cow in his pocket

Travel broadens the mind, they say. But in these days of mass tourism and carbon footprints there’s a lot to be said for staying exactly where you are:

- dianyaa (Tsonga, South Africa) to lie on one’s back with one’s legs apart, gorged with food

- lezarder (French) to lie around basking in the sun like a lizard
- bafalala (Tsonga, South Africa) to lie face down in the sun, to lie asprawl in the open
- naptakhpaya (Dakota, USA) to lie on one’s belly and rest on one’s arms
- ngumulo (Tagalog, Philippines) to put both hands under the head when lying down
- kagwia (Yamana, Chile) to go upstairs and lie down

Presiding

Not that you have to remain entirely supine to relax:

- sumernichat (Russian) to sit outside in the evening doing nothing
- seranggong (Malay) to sit with one’s elbows on the table
- kem-lo-re (Car, Nicobar Islands) to sit on someone’s knee
- upa-nishād (Sanskrit) sitting down at the feet of another to listen to his words
- māhove’ēsee’ē (Cheyenne, USA) to have a tired bottom from sitting
- babaran-on (Ik, Nilo-Saharan) to sit in a group of people warming up in the early morning sun

On reflection

Go to hell
‘See Naples and die’ we’re all told, but what do you do after you’ve visited these admirably named places?

Ecce Homo, Switzerland
Egg, Austria
Hell, Norway
No Guts Captain, Pitcairn Island
Saddam Hussein, Sri Lanka
Sexmoan, Philippines
Silly, Belgium
Starbuck Island, Polynesia
Wedding, Germany

Enviable

The Yamana people of Chile have clearly had plenty of time to think about the many permutations of sitting: utapanus-mutu is to sit by the side of a person but not close to him; usata-ponur mutu is to turn round and sit facing someone; mumbu-moni is to sit holding anything between one’s lips; while kupas-aiiu-matu is to sit envying a person.

Upright

If you get to your feet it doesn’t necessarily mean that you’re on the move:

- pratyutthā n (Hindi) rising from a seat as a mark of respect
- hó’kôhtôheó’e (Cheyenne, USA) to stand leaning on a cane
- suka-a.-moni (Yamana, Chile) to stand dreaming
- hangama (Tsonga, South Africa) to stand with one’s feet wide apart (like a man taking up all the space before a fire)
- tāvoeó’e (Cheyenne, USA) to stand looking goofy

Pedestrian

But once you’ve put one foot in front of the other there’s really no going back:

- semeiont (Greek) walking on the spot
- divāviharana (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) walking about in the day time
- hanyauka (Rukwangali, Namibia) to walk on tiptoe on warm sand
- ha shtatin (Albanian) to walk backwards in a bowed position

Tip-tip-toe

Although this simple action comes in many different styles:

- vukurukuru (Tsonga, South Africa) the noisy walk of a person in a bad temper
- endal (Malay) to walk with the head and shoulders held back and the breast and stomach thrust forward
- bikrang (Bikol, Philippines) to walk with the legs apart as if there was some injury to the area of the crotch
- onya (Setswana, Botswana) to walk at a slow pace nodding one’s head
- lonjak (Malay) to walk affectedly on tiptoe
- vydelyvat krendelya (Russian) to stagger, to walk crookedly (literally, to do the pretzel)
- uluka (Mambwe, Zambia) a person who walks as if he were carried by the wind
The trees are blazed

Be sure you know where you’re going…

- gembelengan (Indonesian) moving around without any certain direction
- sakgasakgle (Setswana, Botswana) to wander about like a homeless orphan

… that the way ahead is clear:

- jimbulwila (Luvale, Zambia) to walk in an unknown place, where there is no clear path
- tlhotlhomela (Tsonga, South Africa) to wriggle one’s way through thick bush

… that you’ve decided whether to cover your tracks:

- kodhola (Oshindonga, Namibia) to leave marks in the sand when walking
- kikinawadakwaiddade (Ojibway, North America) marks on the trees for the traveller to find the trail through the wood (literally, the trees are blazed)
- tuuna-gamata (Yamana, Chile) to walk over where others have walked before and thus make the tracks indistinct

… and that the conditions are suitable:

- hanmani (Dakota, USA) to walk in the night
- tidiwitidiwi (Kerewe, Tanzania) dragging one’s steps through sand or mud
- pfumbura (Shona, Zimbabwe) to walk raising dust
- splerg (Scots) to walk splashing in mud
- shatoka (Lozi, Niger-Congo) to jump from one stone or log to another

*

False friends

- lost (Cornish) tail, queue
- halt (Swedish) lame, limping
- loop (Dutch) walk, gait
- murmur (Persian) to creep
- silk (Bashgali, India) to be slippery

*

That sinking feeling

As what could be worse than losing your footing …

- anammi (Dakota, USA) to give way under the foot (as snow does, when there is water under it)
- bawela (Tsonga, South Africa) to sink away in deep mud
- kawan (Manobo, Philippines) to walk on air above the ground (for example, when walking in the dark and groping for footing, to step and not find footing where you expected it)

… mistaking the ground:

- péese’ov (Cheyenne, USA) to step on someone’s fingers
- traru psa (Sranan Tongo, Surinam) to step on someone’s feet in passing
- gobrai (Boro, India) to fall into a well unknowingly
… or otherwise getting into difficulties:

- dungkal (Bikol, Philippines) to trip and fall head first
- gadngåd (Tagalog, Philippines) falling on one’s nose
- kaiyotan (Dakota, USA) to fall in attempting to sit down
- ra (Tsonga, South Africa) to fall backwards on something hard
- platzen (German) to fall over and burst
- af-vegar (Old Icelandic) fallen on one’s back and unable to rise
- pipilili (Tsonga, South Africa) to fall and roll a few times before stopping

Beard in the postbox

Oh dear, you’re back where you started:

- nu sitter du med skagget i brevladan (Swedish) now you are stuck (literally, now you are sitting with your beard in the postbox)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

To carry coals to Newcastle

- Eulen nach Athen tragen (German) taking owls to Athens
- yezdit’ b Tulu s svoim samovarom (Russian) he’s going to Tula, taking his own samovar
- vendere ghiaccio agli eschimesi (Italian) selling ice to the Eskimos
- echar agua al mar (Spanish) to throw water into the sea
- es como llevar naranjas a Valencia (Spanish) it is like taking oranges to Valencia
- vizet hord a Dunába (Hungarian) he is taking water to the Danube
- gi bakerbarn brød (Norwegian) to give bread to the child of a baker
- vender mel ao colmeeiro (Portuguese) to sell honey to a beemaster Upping Sticks

12.

suusan tsetsnees yavsan teneg deer (Mongolian) a travelling fool is better than a sitting wise person

You can’t spend your whole life flopping around in one place. Sooner or later, whatever traveller’s nerves you may feel, you just have to up sticks and go:

- gabkhron (Boro, India) to be afraid of witnessing an adventure
- resfeber (Swedish) to be jittery before a journey
- andlamuka (Tsonga, South Africa) to pack up and depart, especially with all one’s belongings, or to go for good
- bishu (Chinese) to be away from a hot place in the summer
- campanilismo (Italian) local pride, attachment to the vicinity (literally, bell tower-ism – referring to the fact that people do not want to travel so far as to be out of sight of the bell tower)

Reindeer’s piss

A journey’s a journey whether you are going near …

- poronkusema (Finnish) the distance equal to how far a reindeer can travel without a comfort break – about 5 kilometres (literally, reindeer’s piss)
- tonbogaeri (Japanese) to go somewhere for business and come right back without staying the night (literally, dragonfly’s return)

… or far:

- donde San Pedro perdió el guarache (Mexican Spanish) to the back of beyond; at the ends of the earth
(literally, where St Peter lost his sandal)

- tuwatauhiw-ana (Yamana, Chile) to be absent a very long time and thus cease to remember or care for your country and people (as an emigrant might after a long absence)

False friends

- travel (Norwegian) busy
- crush (Romani) to get out
- bias (Malay) deflected from its course
- grind (Dutch) gravel

Wanderlust

Some people just can’t wait to get going:

- Tapetenwechsel (German) being bored with the place you’re in and wishing to go somewhere else (literally, let’s change the wallpaper)
- echarse el pollo (Chilean Spanish) to get out of town (literally, to throw out the chicken)
- amenonêhne (Cheyenne, USA) to sing while walking along
- henkyoryugaku (Japanese) young women who in their twenties and thirties rebel against social norms and travel abroad to devote time to an eccentric art form such as Balinese dancing (literally, studying abroad in the wild)

Tag-along

But it can get lonely out there, so consider taking a companion:

- uatomoceata (Yamana, Chile) to pass your arm within another’s and bring him along, as friends do
- adi (Swahili) to accompany a person part of their way out of politeness
- Lebensgefährt*e (German) one who travels life’s road with you
- nochschlepper (Yiddish) a fellow traveller, tag-along, camp follower, pain in the arse (literally, someone who drags along after someone else)
- ku-sebeya (Ganda, Uganda) to travel with one’s husband

Wire donkey

Travel on two wheels is always economical, and can be more or less environmentally sound:

- der Drahtesel (German) a bicycle (literally, wire donkey)
- washa (Luvale, Zambia) a bicycle (from the sound it makes as it runs along a narrow path brushing against bushes)
- stegre (Sranan Tongo, Surinam) to ride a bicycle or a motorized two-wheel vehicle on only the back wheel
- bromponie (Afrikaans) a motor scooter (literally, a growling or muttering pony)

Loosely bolted

And though four wheels are faster, there is many a pitfall:

- sakapusu (Sranan Tongo, Surinam) an unreliable vehicle, so called because you always need to get out (saka) and push (pusu)
• galungkung (Maguindanaon, Philippines) the rattling sound produced by a loosely bolted car
• der Frischfleischwagen (German) an ambulance (literally, fresh meat delivery van)
• parte (Chilean Spanish) a traffic ticket; also a baptism or wedding invitation
• gagjom (Tibetan) to set up a roadblock and then rob someone

Highway code

Sometimes the greatest danger on the road comes from other users:

• faire une queue de poisson (French) to overtake and cut in close in front of a car (literally, to do a fishtail)
• Notbremse ziehen (German) to swerve away at the last moment (literally, to pull the handbrake)
• shnourkovat’ sya (Russian) to change lanes frequently and unreasonably when driving (literally, to lace boots)
• autogangsteri (Finnish) a hit-and-run driver

On reflection

Lucky number plates

The Chinese particularly like car number plates with 118, which is pronounced yat yat fatt in Cantonese and sounds like ‘everyday prospers’; 1128 sounds like ‘everyday easily prospers’; and 888 ‘prosper, prosper, prosper’. A number plate with 1164 is not popular because it sounds like yat yat look say, which can mean ‘everyday roll over and die’.

A Hong Kong owner (i.e. a Cantonese speaker) would favour a number plate with just 32168, which sounds like sang yee yat low fatt, meaning ‘a very profitable business all the way’.

Japanese cars can’t have the licence plate 4219 because that could be read as shi ni i ku, which means something along the lines of ‘going to death’.

Jesus’s magimix

If all else fails there’s always public transport (with all the delights that that entails). As the Germans say, ‘We are all equal in the eyes of God and bus drivers’:

• gondola (Chilean Spanish) a municipal bus
• Lumpensammler (German) the last train (literally, rag collector)
• Luftkissenboot (German) a hovercraft (literally, air-cushion boat)

Or perhaps it’s time to splash out on something special:

• magimiks belong Yesus (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) a helicopter

Pushmepullyou

Japanese subways are so crowded that they employ special packers to push people on and others to untangle them and get them off when they get to a station. The pushers-on are addressed as oshiya-san (honourable pusher) and the pullers-off as hagitoriya-san (honourable puller).

Unknown and uneasy

The truth is that travel is rarely as glamorous as it’s portrayed. So whatever happens, keep your nerve:
far-lami (Old Icelandic) unable to go further on a journey kalangkalang (Manobo, Philippines) to be overtaken by night on a journey with no place to stay and nothing to eat asusu (Boro, India) to feel unknown and uneasy in a new place bu fu shultu (Chinese) not accustomed to the climate or food of a new place (said of a stranger)
wewibendam (Ojibway, North America) being in a hurry to return home

Empty trip

And sometimes you will be surprised by unexpected rewards:

inchokkilissa (Alabama, USA) to be alone and experience the quietness of a location uluphā (Telugu, India) supplies given to any great personage on a journey, and furnished gratis by those who reside on the route

Even if you never actually go:

kara-shutcho (Japanese) to pay or receive travel expenses for a trip not actually taken (literally, empty business trip)

Travellers’ tales

Always remember that, as the French say, ‘À beau mentir qui vient de loin’, travellers from afar can lie with impunity:

iwaktehda (Dakota, USA) to go home in triumph having taken scalps

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

To beat about the bush

y aller par quatre chemins (French) to get there by four paths iddur mal-lewz a (Maltese) to go round the almond å gå som katten rundt den varme grøten (Norwegian) to walk like a cat around hot porridge menare il can per l’aià (Italian) to lead the dog around the yard embrorrachar la perdiz (Spanish) to get the partridge drunk 13.
Home Sweet Home

Padres, primos e pombos.
Os dois primeiros, não servem para casar. Os dois últimos só servem para sujar a casa (Portuguese)

Priests, cousins and pigeons. The first two are not good to marry. The last two only make the house dirty

Location, location, location

‘Choose the neighbour before the house’ goes an old Syrian proverb; and it’s as well to check out the people living nearby before you move in:

- kwarts-idioot (Dutch) next door to an idiot
- espreitadeira (Portuguese) a woman who spies on her neighbours
- geitonopoulo/a (Greek) the boy/girl next door
- buurvrouw (Dutch) a neighbour’s wife
- búa-grettur (Old Icelandic) a quarrel between neighbours
- keba (Myanmar) a village reserved for outcasts and beggars

Nesting

If you have space and time, and hopefully some good materials, your best bet is probably to build your own:

- u’skwææi (Mingo, USA) a brick (literally, cooked stone)
- skvorets (Russian) a person transporting building materials to a dacha in a car (literally, a starling – with reference to nest building)
- méygirathu (Tamil) to cover a house with grass, leaves, etc.
- maaia (Yamana, Chile) to build wigwams here and there, as a large number of people flocking to a place will do rather than crowd into two or three existing wigwams
Pulling together

Things always work out better if you’ve got people to help you:

- akittituq (Iñupiat, Inuit) a stitch used for sewing a tent made by having one person on the inside while the other is outside (the one on the inside pushes the needle out so that the other person can pull the thread through; the person on the outside then pushes the needle in for the other person to pull); the same stitch is used for sewing a window into place
- dugnad (Norwegian) working together in everyone’s interest without getting paid (for example, moving into a house, painting, building a cabin, etc.; also applies to parents coming together to paint a kindergarten, or everyone in an apartment building cleaning inside and outside the house together)
- imece (Turkish) a social gathering at which everyone pitches in to help a neighbour undertake a large task

False friends

- abort (German) lavatory
- bang (Korean) room
- dig (Gaelic) ditch
- sir (Arabic) crack of the door
- gate (Norwegian) street
- rub (Croatian) edge

Flagging the beam

In Surinam, when the main roof beam of a new house is in place they have a celebration they call opo-oslo, at which a flower or flag is nailed to the end of the beam, some beer is sprayed on the front of the building and then the builders, owner and others have a drink to celebrate.

Dutch decor

The Dutch have two useful expressions: kneuterig describes a particularly bourgeois type of stinginess which someone might display if they spent a fortune buying a new house and then furnished it with the cheapest fittings available, all in the name of saving money; and its opposite een vlag op een modderschuit, excessive decoration of a common thing, or trying to make the ugly beautiful (literally, a flag on a mud barge).

On reflection

Chinese whispers

It is an increasingly common practice to transliterate foreign proper nouns into Chinese characters that sound similar to the original word but give the Western name a highly positive connotation to Chinese ears:

- adian Athens proper law
- zhili Chile wisdom benefit
- deli Delhi virtue hometown
- faguo France method country
- henghe Ganges everlasting river
- haiya The Hague sea tooth
- ingguo England country of heroes
Frog in a well

The Germans have the wonderful word Gemütlichkeit for that particular quality of cosiness you can only ever feel at home. In that always-descriptive language, someone who prefers to stay at home is a Stubenhocker, literally, a room sitter; and in the end, however splendid the house, it’s our intimate individual eyries we actually spend our time in:

- pung (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) to keep to one’s room
- sucilwa (Mambwe, Zambia) a man who never leaves his hut (literally, all smoked up)
- kúpa-mandúka (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) one who never leaves his home, one ignorant of the world (literally, a frog in a well)

The emperor’s throne

Different cultures have very different approaches to what we euphemistically call the smallest room in the house. The Spanish have excusado, with its polite suggestion of excusing yourself, whereas the German term wo sogar der Kaiser von China allein hingehnt literally means ‘where the emperor of China goes by himself’. Once there, though, we all go through the same motions:

- engkilu’ (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) sticks or leaves used as toilet paper
- zasedat’ (Russian) to sit on the toilet for a long time (literally, to preside)

Toilet museum

Some insist on trying to make us forget why we’re there at all:

- toirebijutsukan (Japanese) a trend whereby young women moving into an apartment alone for the first time will go to extreme lengths to decorate their lavatory, scent it with perfume and stock it with interesting literature (literally, toilet museum)

Spatially aware

We all know these domestic places and spaces; but not all languages have such precise words for them:
• bakatoo (Mandinka, West Africa) the space between the bed and the wall
• izungu (Mambwe, Zambia) the space between the bed and the ground
• caukā (Hindi) a clean corner in the kitchen for having meals; a rectangular slab of stone
• Gifschrank (German) a cupboard where things are kept that may only be lent out to someone with special permission (literally, poison cabinet)
• antardvā r (Hindi) a private door inside a house
• rincón (Spanish) the internal corner (the external corner is esquina)
• Besucherritze (German) the gap where the middle of three people lies when two single beds are pushed together (literally, a visitor’s trench)

Crumb thief

The same is true of the clutter we fill our rooms up with; until, as the Russians say, ‘Igolku nygde votknut’, there’s nowhere you can throw a needle:

• dur dicki mengri (Romani) a telescope (literally, far-seeing-thing)
• hap laplap bilong wasim plet (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) a dish cloth
• kruimeldief (Dutch) a hoover (literally, a crumb thief)
• Staubsauger (German) a vacuum cleaner (literally, dustsucker)
• yötwënkwastahkwa’ (Mingo, USA) radio (literally, people use it for spreading their voice out)
• dinnilos dikkamuktar (Romani) television (literally, fool’s looking box)
• Flimmerkasten (German) television (literally, flickering box)

Whatever our circumstances, in the end, perhaps, we should just be grateful that we are á-panna-griha (Sanskrit), someone whose house has not fallen in.

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

To make a mountain out of a molehill tehdä kärpäsestä härkänen (Finnish) to make a bull out of a fly se noyer dans un verre d’eau (French) to drown oneself in a glass of water til ka taad banaana or rai ka pahaad banana (Hindi) to turn a sesame seed into a large tree or to turn a mustard seed into a mountain arcem e cloaca facere (Latin) to make a stronghold out of a sewer narediti iz muhe slona (Slovenian) to make an elephant from a fly 14. Dinner Time

kopeklerin duası kabul olsa gökten kemik yağardı (Turkish)
if dogs’ prayers were accepted it would rain bones from the sky

Rushed breakfast

When it comes to eating there is, of course, no such thing as a typical meal:

- munkavacsora (Hungarian) a working dinner
- kamatuao (Gilbertese, Oceania) a meal for one who wakes during the night
- bulunenkinoo (Mandinka, West Africa) the first meal cooked by a bride
- ottobrata (Italian) a country outing or picnic in October
- hwyaden (Welsh) the small amount of breakfast a newly married man has time to eat when leaving home for work after intimacy with his new wife (literally, a duck)

My tapeworm is talking

And there are still many parts of the world where you can’t take any kind of refreshment for granted:

- kemarok (Malay) ravenously hungry after an illness
- hiukaista (Finnish) to feel hungry for something salty
- paragadupu (Telugu, India) the state of the stomach before a person has broken his fast
- fulumizya (Mambwe, Zambia) to cook quickly for somebody who is very hungry
- étaoméhōtsenōhtōvenestse napāhpóneehehame (Cheyenne, USA) being very hungry (literally, my tapeworm can almost talk by itself)

Sampling

Particular skills are often required to make sure you’ve got the very best of the ingredients available:
• kupit’ arbuzz navyrez (Russian) to buy a watermelon with the right to sample a section
• pale (Scots) to test a cheese by an incision
• athukkugirathu (Tamil) to press a fruit softly with the fingers

Stirring it up

And then time must be taken to get things correctly and thoroughly prepared:

• jiigi (Buli, Ghana) to stir with much energy, to prepare a hard food that cannot be stirred with one hand
• ri-noo-ko che-he-kuo (Car, Nicobar Islands) chopping up with spoons and forks
• tikudeni (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to put the correct amount of rice into a pot to be cooked
• loity (Finnish) the wave of heat that engulfs you when you throw water on the hot stove

Surprise water

Now is the moment when a cook’s individual skills can make all the difference to the end result. As the Chinese wisely say, ‘Never eat in a restaurant where the chef is thin’:

• tliwat (Tagalog, Philippines) to pour a liquid several times between containers to mix or cool it well
• bikkuri mizu (Japanese) a small amount of cold water added to a boiling pot of spaghetti or other noodles just before they are cooked (literally, surprise water: i.e. the cold water surprises the noodles)
• ilas-ana (Yamana, Chile) to cut and spread meat open so that it cooks quicker
• tuyong (Tagalog, Philippines) water added to make up for water lost (in cooking)

Dead dog

‘Hunger is the best cook,’ say the Germans, and it’s true that when you’re starving even the lightest snack will taste as good as anything you’ve ever eaten:

• smörgås (Swedish) a sandwich (literally, butter goose)
• ekiben (Japanese) a packed lunch dispensed from station kiosks
• dokhlaya sobaka (Russian) a low-quality frankfurter (literally, a dead dog)

Xoox

For the fuller meal, what fine and varied ingredients the world offers:

• jordgubbe (Swedish) a strawberry (literally, earth man)
• ah (Arabic) egg white
• xoox (Eastern Arabic) plums
• sneisar-hald (Old Icelandic) the part of a sausage in which the pin is stuck
• tsé-péene éskóseéhotamého’évohkótse (Cheyenne, USA) a pork sausage

Slug in the hole

Some ingredients might not be to everyone’s taste:

• lelita’ (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) an edible slug of the swampland
• nido (Tagalog, Philippines) an edible bird’s nest
• brarah (Hebrew) second-rate fruits (specifically oranges)
• kavavangaheti (Tsonga, South Africa) a dead animal so large that people cannot finish its meat (for example, hippo, whale or elephant)
• cilh-vā ns (Hindi) the flesh of a kite (the eating of which is said to produce madness)
• mmbwe (Venda, South Africa) a round pebble taken from a crocodile’s stomach and swallowed by a chief

Cabbage or cheese

The Italians even approve or disapprove in terms of food:

• come i cavoli a merenda totally out of place, inappropriate (literally, like cabbage for a snack)
• come il cacio sui maccheroni perfect (literally, like cheese on pasta)

Your legs are long

The actual nosh itself is only part of it. Company is equally important, and in many parts of the world you simply have no idea who’s going to show up:

• pakiroki (Rapanui, Easter Island) a pauper who comes to someone else’s house hoping to be invited to eat
• jiao chang (Chinese) your legs are long (said of someone who arrives just as something delicious is being served)
• a la suerte de la olla (Chilean Spanish) to arrive at someone’s house not knowing what food they will be offering (literally, to the luck of the pot)
• buferák (Czech) a guy who hangs around cafeterias and eats leftovers
• xenodaietes (Ancient Greek) a devourer of guests or strangers

On reflection

Say cheese

When trying to catch a person’s attention and have him/her look into the lens, the old Czech photographers’ phrase was pozor, vyleti ptacek, which literally means ‘watch out, a bird will be released/fly out’ (from the camera). In Serbia, people are asked to say ptica, ‘bird’. Danish photographers have a variety of phrases they can use, but their favourite is sig appelsin, ‘say orange’.

The English word cheese is often used because pronouncing it shapes the mouth into a smile. Other languages have adopted this method, with different words that have a similar sound or effect:

• kimchi (Korean) a traditional fermented dish made of seasoned vegetables
• qiezi (Mandarin) aubergine
• cerise (French) cherry
• whisky (Argentinian Spanish)

In Malta, people sometimes jokingly say ţobon, their word for cheese, which will obviously result in the exact opposite facial expression.

Gobbling it down

Sometimes your guests are so busy filling their faces that they forget about the politer aspects of sharing a meal:

• fresser (Yiddish) someone who eats quickly and noisily
• physingoomai (Ancient Greek) to be excited by eating garlic
• qarun (Persian) someone who eats two dates or two mouthfuls at once
• bwakia (Swahili) to throw into the mouth (for example, pieces of food, nuts, tobacco)
• komba (Chewa, South East Africa) to scrape a pot or dish with the forefinger, as children do
• pelinti (Buli, Ghana) to move very hot food around inside one’s mouth to avoid too close a contact
• ikok (Ik, Nilo-Saharan) to knock bones together in order to take out and eat the marrow from inside
• waphaka (South African Township) to eat faster than the rest

Miss Manners

Scoffing too fast can be just the start of the problem:

• buttare giu tutto come un lavandino (Italian) to eat like a pig (literally, to throw down everything as if one were a sink)
• muwel (Manobo, Philippines) to fill the mouth so that one cannot talk
• hdašna (Dakota, USA) to miss when putting food into one’s mouth
• xom-xoàm (Vietnamese) to speak while one’s mouth is full
• roic (Gaelic) the sumptuous feasting by boorish people without any of the refined manners of genteel society

False friends

sky (Swedish) gravy
tuna (Tuvaluan, Polynesia) prawn or eel binlíd (Tagalog, Philippines) small broken particles of milled rice dark (Albanian) evening meal
fig (Caribbean Creole) banana

Slow Food

So, instead, take your time and fully savour the experience:

• fyompola (Mambwe, Zambia) to lick honey off the fingers
• pisan zapra (Malay) the time needed to eat a banana

Menu envy

For some, the salad next door is always greener:

• Futterneid (German) the desire to eat what is on another person’s plate (literally, feeding envy)
• lyu mupusulo (Mambwe, Zambia) to eat so as to cheat another out of his share of food
• selongkar (Malay) to steal food off a plate
• gagula (Tsonga, South Africa) to take food without permission, showing a lack of good manners

Picky

Others could do with feeling a bit hungry once in a while:

• kieskauw (Dutch) a person who trifles with his food
• malastigà (Tagalog, Philippines) being bored of eating the same food all the time
• Krüsch (northern German) somebody who dislikes a lot of foods (and is therefore difficult to cook for)

My mouth is lonely
And some greedy pigs just don’t know when to stop:

- amuti (Rapanui, Easter Island) a glutton; someone who will eat anything, such as unripe or out-of-season fruit
- akaska (Dakota, USA) to eat after one is full
- ngang da (Vietnamese) to lose one’s appetite because one has eaten between meals
- kuchi ga samishii (Japanese) eating when you don’t need to, for the sake of it or out of boredom (literally, my mouth is lonely)
- knedlíkový (Czech) rather partial to dumplings
- hostigar (Chilean Spanish) to gorge on sweets to the point of nausea

Angel cake

In the end, though, it’s all in the eye – or rather mouth – of the beholder. For better …

- alsof er een engeltje op je tong piest (Dutch) utterly delicious, heavenly tasting (literally, as if an angel is urinating on your tongue)
- kou fu (Chinese) the good luck prerequisite for having opportunities to eat delicious food (literally, mouth fortune)

… or worse:

- panshey (Bengali) food that tastes rather flat
- ichootakbachi (Alabama, USA) to leave a bad taste in the mouth
- tomatoma (Mailu, Papua New Guinea) tasteless food
- pikikiwepogosi (Ojibway, North America) having the taste of an animal that was tired out before it was killed
- tsitlama (Setswana, Botswana) to make a wry face after eating or drinking something nasty

Restaurant review

Tired of cooking at home, not to mention doing the washing-up and putting-away, we may tell ourselves how nice it is to eat out. But though the fantasy is great, the reality is often less so:

- Schlürfbude (German) a fast-food restaurant (literally, slurp dump)
- dolorosa (Spanish) a restaurant bill (literally, painful)
- Abendteuer (German) an expensive evening (literally, an adventure)

The condemned man is a final meal

Possibly the strangest takeaway of all is described by the Russian word korova: this is the unfortunate person that prison camp escapees take with them to eat over their period of flight and in their hideout (it literally means ‘a cow’).

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Too many cooks spoil the broth

- sendou ooku shite fune yama ni noboru (Japanese) too many captains and the boat will go up a mountain
- qi shou, ba jiao (Chinese) seven hands, eight feet
- idha kathira ar-rababina gharigat as-safina (Arabic) too many captains sink the ship
- zo mangna go lhong mi tshu (Dzongkha, Bhutan) when there are too many carpenters the door cannot be erected seul mui à vugulion a vez, e vez faloc’h gouarnet ar saout (Breton, France) the more cowherds there are, the worse the cows are looked after puno baba, kilavo dijete (Croatian) with many midwives, the child will be lazy veel varkens maken de spoeling dun (Dutch) many pigs make the slops sparse zyada jogi math ujaad (Hindi) too many saints can ruin the monastery troppi galli a cantar non fa mai giorno (Italian) with too many cocks singing it is never going to dawn

zuun yamaand jaran uhana (Mongolian) one hundred goats for sixty billy goats

u pyati nyanek dyetya byez glaza, u cemyorykh – byez golovy (Russian) when there are five nurses the child loses an eye – with seven nurses the child is finally found to lack a head

haber más capeadores que toros (Costa Rican Spanish) there are more bullfighters than bulls
The towel of a hippy

The quenching of thirst is another sensation that brings out evocative descriptions. In Chilean Spanish they say they are tener mas sed que piojo de muneca, thirstier than a louse on a doll; or again, in more contemporary usage, toalla hippy, than the towel of a hippy:

- tarfa (Hausa, Nigeria) to pour out drop by drop
- gargalacar (Portuguese) to drink from the bottle
- funda (Swahili) to fill the mouth with water until the cheeks are distended
- srann (Gaelic) a drink as deep as one’s breath will permit
- ngalela (Setswana, Botswana) to drink and drain the contents of a container in one go
- avoir la dalle en pente (French) to have the throat on a slant (in order to be able to drink constantly)

The milky way

The men of the African Toubari and Massa tribes observe a rite called gourouna in which they retire for several months from ordinary pursuits and restraints and drink prodigious amounts of milk.

Social drinking

No one should boire en Suisse (French), drink alone in secret (literally, drinking in the Swiss way). It’s always healthier to share the experience:

- gonets (Russian) one sent to buy alcohol for friends (literally, a herald)
- chistra (Breton, France) to go from farm to farm and ask for cider
- cayetanas (Mexican Spanish) a code word for apple cider disguised in a beer bottle, ordered by cabaret hostesses who don’t want to get drunk
- afdrinken (Dutch) let’s have a drink and be friends
- glaoch (Irish) the act of calling for a round of drinks at a pub
- Bob (Dutch) the designated driver, the one who sticks to one beer and drives everybody home from wherever they’ve been partying (Bob was the name used originally in a famous anti-drink-drive campaign)

Altered states

Soft drinks will satisfy our thirst, but are never as exciting as those which are a bit stronger. It’s surely no coincidence that most of the best words about drinks and drinking involve alcohol. As the literal meaning of the Amerindian Mingo word for alcohol, teka’niköétényös, has it, it changes minds from one way to another: whether it’s beer you’re drinking …

- sampa (Rukwangali, Namibia) to taste beer with one’s finger
- bufferbiertje (Dutch) the beer that is standing next to the beer you’re drinking and serves as a buffer in case you finish drinking your beer before you have a chance to get the barman’s attention (literally, buffer beer)
- der Diesel (German) a mixture of beer and cola

On reflection

To your good health?

Around the world the commonest drinking toast is to good health: Na zdravje (Slovenian), Salud (Spanish), Saúde (Brazilian Portuguese), Kia Ora (Maori), Egészségédré (Hungarian), Gezondheid (Flemish). The Ukrainians take this to the next level with Budmo!, which means ‘let us live forever!’

In contrast, the Scandinavian drinking toast Skål! (pronounced ‘skoal’) has a much more macabre background, as it originally meant ‘skull’. The word is alleged to have come down from a custom practised by the warlike Vikings who used the dried-out skulls of their enemies as drinking mugs.

… or something rather more powerful:

- Dreimännerwein (German) a wine so disgusting it takes three men to drink it (two men to make you drink it – you are the third)

- kadamsana (Malawi) a very strong home-made spirit (literally, that which brings darkness during the day – aptly describing its knock-out effects)

Vodka vocabulary

The Russians, in particular, have a fine set of words for the many styles of tippling:

- pogoda shepchet to take time off from work, or a desire to get drunk (literally, the weather is whispering)
- bukhat’ to drink alone
- deryabnut’ to drink quickly in order to warm up
- gorlo to drink from the bottle
- vspryskivat’ to drink in celebration of a holiday or a new purchase (literally, to besprinkle)
- daganyat’ sya to drink in order to get drunk, to try to catch up with the amount of drinking that others have already done
- otglyantsevat’ to drink beer or wine after vodka (literally, to gloss a photo print)
- ostogrammit’sya to drink 100 grams of vodka as a remedy for a hangover
False friends

full (Norwegian) drunk
grogi (Finnish) whisky and soda pickle (Chilean Spanish) a person who drinks too much jaw (Zarma, Nigeria) to be thirsty

On a slippery road

And all languages have evocative expressions for being drunk …

- sternhagelvoll (German) full of stars and hail
- rangi-changi (Nepalese) slightly too multi-coloured
- être rond comme une bille (French) to be as round as a marble
- redlös (Swedish) ride free
- andar cacheteando la banqueta (Mexican Spanish) to go along with one’s cheek on the pavement

… and for the inevitable results of overdoing it:

- khukhurhuteka (Tsonga, South Africa) to walk uncertainly, as a drunk man among people seated on the floor
- midåbodåboka (Malagasy, Madagascar) to fall over frequently, as drunken men or people on a slippery road
- mawibi (Ojibway, North America) drunken weeping
- Backhendlfriedhof (Austrian German) a beer belly (literally, cemetery for fried chickens)
- ne govori ou samoi muzh piatnisa (Russian) a shrug of understanding when sharing someone else’s problems (literally, no need to explain, my husband is a drunk)

Under the monkey

For the French you are as sober as un chameau (a camel) but as drunk as un cochon (a pig), une grive (a thrush), or even une soupe (a soup). In Lithuanian you can also be drunk as a pig (kiaulė), or then again as a bee (bitelė) or a shoemaker (šiaučius). Elsewhere you can be drvo pijan (Macedonian) drunk as a tree; jwei ru ni (Mandarin) drunk as mud; orracho como una uva (Cuban Spanish) drunk as a grape; bull som en kaja (Swedish) drunk as a jackdaw; itdek mast (Uzbek) drunk as a dog; or einen Affen sitzen haben (German) to be dead drunk (literally, to have a monkey sit on one).

The morning after

It’s only when you get home that you may start to wonder what on earth possessed you:

- rhwe (Tsonga, South Africa) to sleep on the floor without a mat and usually drunk and naked
• gidravlicheskiy budil’nik (Russian) a full bladder (literally, an hydraulic alarm clock)
• sasamudilo (Ndebele, Southern Africa) a drink of beer in the morning after a debauch, a pick-me-up
• peregar (Byelorussian) the residual taste of alcohol in the mouth and the heavy stench of low-grade alcohol around a habitual drinker

Vineyard flu

And all drinking cultures have inventive expressions for the horrors of the morning after:

• avoir la gueule de bois (French) to have a wooden mouth
• babalasi (Venda, South Africa) a trembling hangover
• futsukayoi (Japanese) a hangover (literally, second day drunk)
• winderdgriep (Afrikaans) a hangover (literally, vineyard flu)
• einen Kater haben (German) to have a hangover (literally, to have a tomcat)
• scimmia (Italian) to have a hangover (literally, a monkey)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Don’t cry over spilt milk

paid â chodi pais ar ôl piso (Welsh) don’t lift a petticoat after peeing kusat sebe lokti (Russian) to bite one’s elbows nasi sudah menjadi bubur (Indonesian) the rice has become porridge eső után köpönyeg (Hungarian) coat after rain 16.
All in a Day’s Work

yesli khochetsya rabotat’ lyag pospi i vsyo proydyot (Russian) if you feel an urge to work take a nap and it will pass

Pounce and decoy

Time was when going out to work meant leaving the cave or hut to forage for food:

- mbwandira (Chichewa, Malawi) to catch a small animal like a bird or mouse by pouncing on top of it

!mbwandira

- puyugaktuq (Inupiat, Inuit) to approach a sea mammal by crawling
- tamigata (Yamana, Chile) to form together in a continuous line in order to drive birds up into a creek and then hemming them round to cut off their retreat to the open water
- kanghanzila (Mambwe, Zambia) he who stands behind the game and imitates the lion’s roar so as to drive the game into the nets
- sendula (Mambwe, Zambia) to find accidentally a dead animal in the forest (and be excited at the thought that a lion or leopard could be still around)
- walakatla (Tsonga, South Africa) to fling down in disgust, as a hunter does with his spears when returning empty-handed

!puyugaktuq

Point blank

In our rapidly developing world, this is obviously less and less the case, as age-old skills are replaced by a more up-to-date weapon:

- paltik (Kapampangan, Philippines) a home-made gun
- otselask (Estonian) a point-blank shot
- tsikinika (Oshindonga, Namibia) to shoot something at close range
Dodo

Even if the matching cunning of animals remains much the same:

- debideboo (Mandinka, West Africa) a bird which pretends not to be able to fly but slips away any time an attempt is made to catch it
- kavraq (Iñupiat, Inuit) a wounded caribou that runs away unobserved
- ugutur-kona-ina (Yamana, Chile) to go about on the water evading sight; to hide as ducklings or goslings do to evade the hunter
- vulwa-vulwa-vulwa (Tsonga, South Africa) to run a little, stop and look round before proceeding, like a buck anxious not to be seen

Spear hurling

Out on the seas and oceans, however, the traditional tools of hook and net have not been seriously superseded; nor have the associated skills:

- zekumuna (Luvale, Zambia) to pull out a fish which flies off the hook and falls onto the ground
- alatkaqtuq (Iñupiat, Inuit) to scan the landscape from an elevated point, to look into water for signs of fish
- ukomona (Yamana, Chile) to hurl the spear at fish, but at no special one, hoping to spear one among the shoal
- wasswa (Ojibway, North America) spearing fish at night by the light of a torch

Eel dribbling

In the countless islands of the Pacific, such techniques have been carefully honed:

- kikamu (Hawaiian) the gathering of fish about a hook that they hesitate to bite
- atua tapa (Rapanui, Easter Island) the orientation point for fishermen, which is not in front of the boat, but on the side
- hakakau (Hawaiian) to stand with precarious footing, as on the edge of a canoe looking for squid
- 'ea'ea (Hawaiian) to cover the eyebrows, as a fisherman shading the eyes while looking into deep water for fish
- ka ro'iro'i i te koreha (Rapanui, Easter Island) to dribble on the eel, to drop your spittle, mixed with chewed bait, into the water to attract the eel

Sea women

In Japan, abalone fishing is often done in husband and wife teams. The women, who are thought to be better at holding their breath and withstanding the cold for long periods, do the pearl diving, while the husbands take charge of the boat and the lifeline. The wives are known as ama – ‘sea women’.

Bamboo cutters

Once the world moved on from hunting and gathering, a degree of occupational specialization was bound to creep in:

- baradi'l (Arabic) a maker of donkey saddles
- murd-shuy (Persian) a washer of dead bodies
- ngmoruk-yaarooaba (Buli, Ghana) a ritual rain-maker
- médara (Telugu, India) belonging to the caste that cut bamboos and live by selling them
- gardziiiba (Tibetan) an astrologist or a person in charge of the cups and dishes during parties
- bakamyi (Rwanda and Burundi dialect) a person credited with supernatural powers who milked the royal cows
Mekametz (Talmudic Hebrew) a man who gathers dog faeces so that he may hand them over to the Burskai, men who process animal skins

Angel makers

As societies became more developed, so jobs became more rarified …

- netty (Scots) a woman who traverses the country in search of wool
- sunba (Tibetan) someone who looks after irrigation canals
- bagaceiro (Portuguese) a workman who feeds sugar-cane husks into a furnace
- poppendokter (Dutch) a mender of dolls (literally, a doll doctor)
- catadeira (Portuguese) a woman who culls coffee beans by hand
- faiseur d’anges (French) an illegal abortionist (literally, an angel maker)
- paçaci (Turkish) a man who sells sheep’s trotters
- khà ndika (Sanskrit) a seller of sugar plums
- bengaleiro (Portuguese) an umbrella maker or salesman

False friends

trafik (Hungarian) tobacconist agenda (French) notebook, diary basin (Turkish) the press fabric (Russian) factory pasta (Portuguese) briefcase, folder

Soul plumbers

… until we end up with occupations that are entirely sophisticated and modern:

- amanuensis (Dutch) a laboratory attendant
- arquitonto (Central American Spanish) a stupid architect
- basura (Spanish) rubbish inspectors
- dal’noboishitsa (Russian) a prostitute who specializes in a clientele of truckers
- değnekçi (Turkish) an unofficial/self-appointed parking attendant
- Seelenklempner (German) a psychiatrist (literally, a soul plumber)
- culero (Spanish) a drug smuggler who hides the drugs in his rectum
- jasusa (Arabic) a woman spy
- profesores taximetros (Columbian Spanish) part-time professors who hold a number of teaching positions at various institutions from and to which they rush by taxi (literally, taxicab professors)

On reflection

Hippopotomonstrosesquipedalianism
(the practice of using long words)

The Germans are renowned for their love of long words where several words are compounded to form an extremely specific word, often to do with the world of work, such as:

Donaudampfschifffahrtsgesellschaftskapitänsjackenknopfloch the buttonhole in the jacket of a captain of the Danube steam boat company or Reichseisenbahnhinundherschiebershäuschen the little house of the state railway track shunter

But other languages also have their own lengthy words:

megszentségteleníthetetlenségeskedéseltekért (Hungarian) for your unprofaneable actions kindercarnavalsoptochtvoorbereidingswerkzaamheden (Dutch) preparation activities for a children’s carnival procession inconstitucionalissimamente (Portuguese) very unconstitutionally prijestolonaslijednikovica (Croatian) wife of an heir to the throne

Low profile

Of course, to do a job properly, certain key skills are useful:

- aprovechar (Spanish) to get the best out of or make the most of an opportunity
- diam ubi (Malay) to work quietly or with a low profile until successful
- kamgar (Persian) one who accomplishes whatever he wishes
- dub-skelper (Scots) one who goes his way regardless of mud and puddles (used light-heartedly of a young bank clerk whose duty it is to run about giving notice that bills are due)
- coyote (Mexican Spanish) a person who handles certain troublesome legal procedures at government agencies on behalf of third parties and for a fee, by means of kick-backs and/or bribes (literally, coyote, a wolflike wild dog)

Horn diggers

However, we should never underestimate the virtue of good, old-fashioned graft:

- greadan (Gaelic) spending a considerable time and giving all one’s might to anything
- balebosteven (Yiddish) to bustle like a meticulous housewife
- ryt’ rogom zemlyu (Russian) to make great efforts (literally, to dig up the ground with one’s horn)
- echar la casa por la ventana (Latin American Spanish) to go all out (literally, to throw the house out of the window)

- sisu (Finnish) obstinate determination, heroic guts, stubborn persistence
- dumog (Tagalog, Philippines) to be absorbed in the fulfilment of one’s task

Mice milkers
Even so, diligence isn’t everything. There are some poor workers who bust a gut but fail to please simply because they can’t see the bigger picture. The French describe this as chercher midi à quatorze, literally, to look for midday at two o’clock in the afternoon. To the Dutch, a person who pays excessive attention to detail is a mierenneuker – literally, an ant fucker; or, more charitably, a muggenzifter (mosquito sitter) or a punaisepoetser (pin polisher). But all cultures are colourful in their criticism:

- Erbsenzaehler (German) someone concerned with small things (literally, counter of peas)
- pilkunnussija (Finnish) an extreme pedant (literally, comma fucker)
- taburaka (Gilbertese, Oceania) one who exaggerates rules and regulations, a stickler for the letter of the law
- Mäusemelker (German) someone who eagerly concentrates on the nitty-gritty rather than the wider overview (literally, someone who milks mice)
- gladit’ shnurki (Russian) to be over-solicitous, to do too much (literally, to iron someone’s shoelaces)

Jobsworth

Other colleagues bring other problems:

- Schnarchnase (German) someone who is slow in acting (literally, snoring nose)
- pezezengdeng (Manobo, Philippines) to be spoken to but sit motionless and ignore their request
- reke (Yoruba, Nigeria, Benin and Togo) to wait in expectation of another’s mistake
- kyag-kyag (Tibetan) throwing obstacles in the way of another’s work, out of spite
- švejkování (Czech) deviously undermining your boss or circumventing your supervisor’s wishes while appearing angelically innocent and even rather simple (in the manner of the Good Soldier Svejk, the novel by Jaroslav Hasek)
- suthi vuttiya (Tamil) the method used by call centre employees to avoid taking people’s calls by changing their place on the list

Promises, promises

At least you can rely on the hopeless, spiteful and devious to be counterproductive. Worse are those who promise to help but never deliver, or who rush around frantically but never get anywhere:

- kaengeng (Gilbertese, Oceania) to say ‘yes yes’ and do nothing about it
- llamarada de petate (Central American Spanish) an undertaking started with great enthusiasm and suddenly dropped (petate is a woven reed mat used for sleeping)
- hubyahubyeka (Tsonga, South Africa) to hurry here and there achieving nothing
- ningas-kugon (Tagalog, Philippines) the sudden spurt of enthusiasm followed by a slowing down and an eventual slipping back into old habits
- robota ne vovk, v lis ne vtiče (Ukrainian proverb) I can get back to doing that later (literally, work is not a wolf, it doesn’t run into the woods)
- nakinaki (Mandinka, West Africa) to go here and there pretending to be busy in order to avoid work
- mikka bouzu (Japanese) a quitter (literally, three-day monk: a person who leaves the monkhood only three days after taking his vows)

Pedalling in yoghurt

The French, in particular, have a fine range of metaphors for not getting things done for one reason or another. Brasser de l’air is to give the impression of being busy (literally, to shuffle the air); peigner la girafe is to waste time in idle pursuits (literally, to comb the giraffe); pedaler dans le yaourt means to be getting nowhere fast (literally, to be pedalling in yoghurt); while un coup d’épée dans l’eau is a wasted effort (literally, a sword blow into water).
Counting the stars

One would almost prefer to work alongside those who model their lives on the Mexican Spanish expression el trabajo embrutece, work brutalizes …

- poltrone (Italian) lazybones (literally, easy chairs)
- shitat zvyozdy (Russian) to twiddle one’s thumbs (literally, to count the stars)
- jeta (Swahili) a lazy person who does not stir himself to get the things he wants, but asks others to fetch them, even though the things may be quite near to him
- bulat (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to have a phobia of certain jobs
- imilila (Mambwe, Zambia) to work half-heartedly, all the time thinking about leaving

The company tribe

… or are perhaps waiting in hope for those sought-after positions that will surely, eventually, come up:

- enchufe (Spanish) a cushy job (literally, a plug or socket)
- anichado (Portuguese) hidden away, as in a niche; well-placed in a good job
- der Tintenpisser (German) a bureaucrat (literally, ink pisser)
- tagapagpaganáp (Tagalog, Philippines) an executive
- nthelavasati (Tsonga, South Africa) a place where one works that is not too distant from home
- shayo-zoku (Japanese) employees living extravagantly on company money (literally, the company tribe)

Sell out

Although it’s wise to remember that blind loyalty to the organization is much overrated:

- ser líder charro (Mexican Spanish) to be a union leader who sells out to company management
- wegloben (German) to laud away (i.e. if a superior wants to get rid of a co-worker he draws up an exaggerated testimonial to ensure that the unloved staffer leaves the company)
- extraknäck (Swedish) a job on the side
- kutu-loncat (Indonesian) someone who constantly moves from job to job for better prospects or wages (literally, jumping bug)

Lilies of the field

Perhaps the luckiest are those who don’t have to do anything at all:

- goyang kaki (Malay) to shake one’s leg; to live comfortably without having to work hard; to live off one’s land or fortune or legacy
- caer en blandito (Latin American Spanish) to have a situation turn out extremely well without much effort (literally, to fall on a soft surface)
- péter dans la soie (French) to live the life of Riley (literally, to fart in silk)

Bad workman blames his tools

- el mal escribano le echa la culpa a la pluma/el cojo le echa la culpa al empedrado (Spanish) the poor writer blames the pen/the limping man blames the pavement
- zlej baletnicy przeszkadza rąbek u spódnicz (Polish) a poor dancer will be disturbed even by the hem of her skirt
- ’araj al jamal min shiffatu (Arabic) the camel limped from its split lip plokhomu tantsory (i) yaytsa meshayut (Russian) a poor dancer is impeded (even) by his own balls kush nuk di ç’është lodhja, ai nuk di ç’është çlodhja (Albanian) who does not know tiredness, does not know how to relax

Celebrating Monday

However hard we work, it’s important to take time off, even if we have to be clever about how we arrange it:

- hacer San Lunes (Mexican Spanish) to take Monday off because the weekend was too exhausting (literally, to celebrate St Monday)
- puente (Spanish) bridge; the Spanish have their bank holidays on a Tuesday so that Monday will, on most occasions, be treated as a bridge day (an extra day of holiday), ensuring a four-day weekend; there is also a viaducto, which is when holidays fall on a Tuesday and a Thursday, thus enabling someone to take the whole week off

Slow start

How wonderful to let slip the usual routines, take your time, take it easy:

- faire la grasse matinée (French) to sleep in (literally, to make a fat morning)
- pegar(sele) las sábanas a (alguien) (Latin American Spanish) to oversleep (literally, to have the sheets stick to you)
- guzu guzu suru (Japanese) being slow when you have something you should be doing; a half-wakeful sleep, especially in the morning when you have sort of woken up but are still playing with your dreams
- faire le tour du cadran (French) to sleep the day away (literally, to do the tour of the clock’s face)

Idle time

Even when one has fully woken up there’s no pressure to do anything:

- cangkul angin (Malay) hoeing the air; putting one’s feet up in the air or doing useless things

Although sometimes the lack of pressure can be pressurizing in itself:

- Zeit totschlagen (German) somebody who has free time but doesn’t know what to do, so does something senseless (literally, to beat time to death)
- egkila-kila (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to act foolishly as a means to combat boredom
- tsurumun (Japanese) a single woman who dreads being alone on national holidays and invents reasons to visit friends
False friends

black (Swedish) ink brief (German) letter
fart (French) ski wax gong (Balinese) orchestra war-side (Somali) newspaper urinater (Latin) diver rust (Dutch) rest or tranquillity

Cucumber troop

There are all kinds of things one can do with time off. What about watching some football? Fans would surely agree that few players can be a peleon (Puerto Rican Spanish), one who plays like Pele, but the Germans have gathered an evocative vocabulary for the highs (and lows) of watching a match:

- der Schlachtenbummler a football fan who travels to support his team at home and away (literally, battle stroller)
- der Hexenkessel a football stadium of the opposing team, with the fans creating a heated atmosphere (literally, witch’s cauldron)
- kleinklein passing the ball from player to player without a plan (literally, small small)
- Blutgratsche a nasty tackle
- die Gurkentruppe a team that plays badly and unprofessionally, a disaster area, incompetent bunch of players (literally, cucumber troop)

Aggro

Or one could take up a heavier or more demanding sport:

- bariga (Tagalog, Philippines) being thrown down in wrestling (literally, the bigger end of an egg)
- atuila (Yamana, Chile) to press down on someone and make his legs give way so that he can be held down
- munasat (Persian) taking hold of one another’s forelocks when fighting
- binti (Manobo, Philippines) a test of strength in which one man stands with his legs apart and his opponent runs from behind and kicks him in the calf of the leg with his shin in an attempt to knock him over; they then change places and continue until one is clearly defeated or gives up because of the pain

Ski-lane terror

Up in the mountains, it’s fast, dangerous, but always fun:

- Pistenschreck (German) a skier you have to watch out for (literally, ski-lane terrorist)
- tulee! (Finnish) look out! I’m skiing/sledging down towards you at high speed! (literally, it’s coming!)
- ahterijarrut (Finnish) falling off your skis and using your tail-end to stop (literally, arse-brakes)
Fackelabfahrt (German) a flaming-torchlight ski-run down the side of a steep snowy mountain, undertaken at night by around fifty skiers

On reflection

The sound of your heart racing

Every language has onomatopoeic words, whose sound and rhythm vividly describe the sound or action they describe:

- hara hara doki doki (Japanese) the feeling of your heart racing when you’re scared or nervous
- nyurrugu (Yidiny, Australia) the noise of talking heard a long way off when the words cannot be made out
- vuhubya-hubya (Tsonga, South Africa) the flapping of pendulous breasts of a woman hurrying
- krog-krog (Tibetan) a sound produced by grinding hard brittle objects together
- empap (Malay) the sound of a flat object falling on a soft surface
- mswatswa (Chichewa, Malawi) the sound of footsteps on dry grass
- ndlangandzandlangandza (Tsonga, South Africa) the sound of drums during an exorcism ritual, beaten to cure a possessed person
- geeuw (Dutch) a yawn
- guntak (Malay) the rattle of pips in a dry fruit
- gwarlingo (Welsh) the rushing sound a grandfather clock makes before striking the hour
- phut (Vietnamese) the noise of string or rope that snaps
- zhaghzhagh (Persian) the noise made by almonds or by other nuts shaken together in a bag
- schwupp (German) quick as a flash (short for schwuppiwupp)
- szelescic (Polish) the sound when someone folds paper (pronounced scheleshchich)

Taking a dip

Down by the sea, river or lakeside, the activity on our day off is altogether gentler:

- nchala-nchala-nchala (Tsonga, South Africa) to swim noiselessly and swiftly
- zaplyvats (Byelorussian) to swim far out
- maulep (Maguindanao, Philippines) a diver who can stay underwater for a long time, holding his breath
- kataobairi (Gilbertese, Oceania) to go under the surface of the water with only one’s nostrils above
- terkapai-kapai (Malay) nervously moving the arms about (said of a bad swimmer)
- tankah (Hawaiian Pidgin) a surfboard that seats six
- limilimi (Hawaiian) to be turned over and over in the surf

Dizzy dancing

In many parts of the world, though, resources dictate that they have to make their own fun:
- akkharićā (Pali, India) a game recognizing syllables written in the air or on one’s back
- antyākṣhṛī (Hindi) a poetic competition in which a contestant recites a couplet beginning with the last letter recited by the previous contestant and which is then carried on by rival teams
- kapana (Setswana, Botswana) to catch each other with both hands when taking turns to fall from a height
- sikki (Ilokano, Philippines) a game played by tossing pebbles aloft and catching as many of them as possible on the back of the hand
- pitz/pokolpok (Mayan, Central America) a game in which the object is to put a rubber ball through a stone ring using only hips, knees and elbows
- mmamadikwadikwane (Setswana, Botswana) a game in which a child spins round until dizzy; it’s also the term for ballroom dancing
Taking part

The Tagalog language of the Philippines has some great words to describe how – literally speaking – to play the game:

- salimpusa asking someone to participate in a game to appease him, although he is not necessarily wanted
- perdegana an agreement in certain games whereby the loser wins
- haplit the final burst of energy when trying to win a race

Suits and tricks

If you’re grebleyi na kon’kakh (Russian) incompetent at sports (literally, to row on skates), perhaps it’s wiser to seek alternative thrills:

- aéstomêhasené (Cheyenne, USA) to play cards for nothing; that is, to play without betting anything
- hila’ (Manobo, Philippines) to take a trick with a winning card
- orobairi (Gilbertese, Oceania) to hit the nose of the loser in cards
- Kiebitz (German) an onlooker at a card game who interferes with unwanted advice
- kofu kofu (Sranan Tongo, Surinam) a bet where the winner gets to hit the loser

Live entertainment

‘Those who have free tickets to the theatre have the most criticism to make,’ say the Chinese, but live entertainment can often be surprisingly enjoyable (for those taking part, that is):

- recevoir son morceau de sucre (French) to be applauded the moment one first appears on stage (literally, to receive one’s piece of sugar)
- Sitzfleisch (German) the ability to sit through long and boring events without losing concentration (literally, seat meat)

One is fun

For the Japanese, gentler pleasures suffice:

- sabi a feeling of quiet grandeur enjoyed in solitude (normally involving the beauty that comes from the natural ageing of things)
- shibui a transcendentally beautiful and balanced image, such as an autumn garden (literally, sour, astringent)

Stories with bears

Or one could indulge one’s creative urges:

- brat s potolka (Russian) to make something up (literally, to take something from the ceiling)
- hoháótha’hâne (Cheyenne, USA) to laugh while storytelling
- istories gia arkudes (Greek) narrated events that are so wild and crazy it seems that they can’t possibly be true (literally, stories with bears)
Bookmark

Or just kick back and enjoy the efforts of others:

- kioskvältare (Swedish) a bestselling film/book (literally, something that tips over the booth)
- hinmekuru (Japanese) to turn a page over violently
- ádi (Telugu, India) a mark left in a book to show the place where the reader left off

Drooping tongue

However hard you try to prevent it, our day of recreation draws to its inevitable end:

- bantil (Bikol, Philippines) to pinch the back of the neck to relieve weariness
- traer la lengua de corbata (Latin American Spanish) to be worn out; to be exhausted (literally, to have your tongue hanging out like a man’s tie)

Nodding off

And in different postures and places we drift into blessed oblivion:

- corra-chodal (Gaelic) sleeping on one’s elbow
- clavar el pico (Latin American Spanish) to fall asleep in a sitting position
- kakkawornendi (Kaurna Warra, Australia) to nod when sleeping
- itanochi (Alabama, USA) to go to sleep on the floor or by a fire
- yum (Car, Nicobar Islands) to sleep with someone in one’s arms

Staying up

Among the Cheyenne people of the USA, sleep may be the last thing they get up to at night:

- vónañá’éné to cook all night
- vónañáhtóóhe to howl all night
- vónañhaso’he to ride a horse all night
- vónañsé’sé to drink all night
- vónañhasené to play cards all night
- vónñeméóhe to run all night
- vónñcóó’e to stand all night
- vónñeváñéne to fart all night
- vónñó’ó to float all night
- vónóóhtóá to sell all night
- vóono‘éetahe to have sex all night
- vóono‘eohtsé to travel by wagon all night
- vóono‘otse‘ohe to work all night

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

To take a sledgehammer to crack a nut mogi jabeeryuda chogasamgan da taewonda (Korean) burning your whole house trying to catch a mosquito tuo kuzi fang pi (Mandarin) to take your trousers off to fart pire için yorgan yakmak (Turkish) to burn the duvet because of one flea kee chang jahb thak-a-thaen (Thai) ride an elephant to catch a grasshopper met een kanon op een mug schieten (Dutch) to shoot a mosquito with a cannon gubbi mEle bramhAstravE? (Kannada, India) a nuclear weapon on a sparrow?

When humans looked around them and saw the animals that inhabited their world they often came up with names that described what each animal looked or sounded like, or how it behaved. Among the Amerindian tribes the Navaho word for squirrel is the phrase ‘it has a bushy tail’ and the word from the Arapaho for elephant is ‘it has a bent nose’. The Mingo language was particularly expressive in this regard:

- uaehkwěęnyö’ a peacock (literally, it puts suns all over it)
- teyunê’kêöt a sheep (literally, it’s got two horns attached)
- këōtanêhkwi a horse (literally, it hauls logs)
- teka’nyakaité’ a mole (literally, both of its hands are slanted)
- tewathsistükwas a firefly (literally, it scatters sparks)
- tsyūwê’staka’ a seagull (literally, it is known for being around sea-foam)
- uthëhtææhtáne’ a caterpillar (literally, its fuzz itches)
- teyu’skwææt a bull (literally, two standing stones – referring to the bull’s testicles)

Likewise, when Chinese voyagers first saw the kangaroo they described the way it looked to them: dai shu, pocket rat, or great rat with a pocket. The Yoruba of West Africa, unused to zebras, called them ‘striped horses’. The Indian nations of the Americas were astounded at the sight of the horse when it appeared, brought by the early Spanish conquerors. The Aztecs thought it was a hornless deer. The Sioux named it shunika wakän, supernatural dog, and the Cheyenne referred to it as mo-eheno’ha, domesticated elk. Another animal new to the Cheyenne, the pig, joined their language as esikoseeschetame, dog with sharp nose.

False friends

- snog (Danish) grass snake
- asp (Pahlavi, Iran) horse
- dud (Arabic) caterpillar, worm
- formica (Latin) ant
- hunt (Estonian) wolf
- hunt (Yiddish) dog
- lamb (Amharic, Ethiopia) cow
Fluttering and kicking

Those peoples living closely with animals developed vocabulary to describe all sorts of precisely observed behaviour on land …

- vweluka (Mambwe, Zambia) to jump from branch to branch (said of a monkey)
- gigigigigi (Tsonga, South Africa) to stand about dispersed and all looking intently at something in the distance, as cattle seeing a lion
- telki (Swahili) the quick ambling gait of a donkey, half walk, half run
- thakgantse (Setswana, Botswana) to kick in all directions (as an ox when one leg is held by a thong)
- glamarsaich (Gaelic) the noisy lapping (as of a hungry dog)
- shebwoso (Potawatomi, USA) a rabbit running fast

… of fish and other creatures at sea:

- tekab (Maguindanaon, Philippines) a fish opening its mouth and producing bubbles
- siponaina (Yamana, Chile) to go along on the surface of the water and cause a ripple, as fish do
- aiagata (Yamana, Chile) to rise up on end and take a deep dive, as the whale when it raises up its flukes
- itupi (Mambwe, Zambia) dead fish found floating
- hu-q-a (Nuuchahnulth, Canada) a salmon going along with its dorsal fin out of the water

… and of birds and insects on the ground and in the air:

- abhinibbijhati (Pali, India) to break quite through (said of the chick coming through the shell of the egg)
- magaatu (Yamana, Chile) to tuck the head under the wing, as birds do when composed for sleep
- ava-sam-di na (Sanskrit) the united downward flight of birds
- kpha (Dakota, USA) to be wet or clogged, as mosquitos’ wings with dew
- tikutamoamo (Gilbertese, Oceania) to alight everywhere (of a dragonfly)

Scratch, chew, tear, beat

Some actions are common to many creatures:

- kwe-swanta (Ganda, Uganda) to lick one’s chops when one has not had enough to eat
- kengerhele (Tsonga, South Africa) to stop suddenly in surprise, be on the alert, as animals hearing a noise
- kukuta (Swahili) to shake off water after getting wet, in the way a bird or dog does
- zeula (Kalanga, Botswana) the chewing of animals late at night
- hachistitabati (Alabama, USA) to beat the tail on the ground
- imba (Mambwe, Zambia) to tear away the prey from one another, as animals fighting over food
Wriggle, wriggle

There are words for sounds too, even those surely heard only by those who live cheek by jowl with the fauna of the world:

- pasāw (Tagalog, Philippines) the noise of fish wriggling in the water
- rerejat (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) the noise made by a cricket on landing
- kichchu (Tamil) the chirping of birds; the whining of infants
- ekkaranam (Tamil) a noise which a bull makes when about to attack another
- sarata (Buli, Ghana) the sound and behaviour of running animals (leaving a trail of dust in the air)
- tyaka-tyaka (Tsonga, South Africa) the noise of cattle crashing through dry bush
- gungurhu-gungurhu-gungurhu (Tsonga, South Africa) to clatter like a rat trapped in a box
- andalā (Arabic) the song of the nightingale
- atīt (Arabic) the moaning bray of a camel
- inchasāaya (Alabama, USA) a rattlesnake’s rattle

Sunday roast

There are words to describe the most detailed aspects of an animal’s appearance …

- scory (Scots) the wrinkled texture of a hedgehog’s cheeks
- gansuthi (Boro, India) the first-grown feather of a bird’s wing
- kapy-āsa (Sanskrit) the buttocks of an ape
- sondi (Pali, India) the neck of a tortoise
- sprochaille (Irish) the loose fold of skin between the legs of a turkey
- mokadi (Setswana, Botswana) the fat of a bullfrog
- kuris (Manobo, Philippines) the fortune of a chicken written in the scales of its feet

Tucked away

… how they store their food:

- brāōa-hola (Old Icelandic) a hole where the wild beasts carry their prey
- wakhedan (Dakota, USA) the places from which squirrels dig up food
- achnātus (Karuk, North America) a place where a rat stores its food
- tsembrututa (Chichewa, Malawi) a type of mouse known for saving food for the future
- indagitagan (Ojibway, North America) the place where a wild animal goes to eat in the woods

Crocodile skid

… even how they behave in specific and group ways:

- kekerikaki (Gilbertese, Oceania) a fish which sometimes swims backwards
- teosammul (Estonian) the speed of a snail
- atītqūq (Inupiat, Inuit) bears going down to the sea
- wosdohedan (Dakota, USA) paths made by squirrels in the grass
- pe’mkowet’ (Potawatomi, USA) bear tracks in the snow
- lantar (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) the skidmark left on a riverbank by a boat or crocodile sliding into the water

Wa!

Originally, humans began by treating animals as hostile, to be hunted, chased away or killed:
• phongoloxa (Tsonga, South Africa) to throw stones or sticks at an animal to frighten it away
• pisqeyay (Quechuan, Andes) to scare off birds
• khapela (Tsonga, South Africa) to drive animals into another’s land so that they may do damage there
• bohanskinyan (Dakota, USA) to make an animal crazy or furious by shooting
• phitsisitse (Setswana, Botswana) to kill an insect by crushing it between the finger and thumb

Down on the farm

But then came the thought of using certain breeds to their advantage:

• nanagi (Rapanui, Easter Island) to mark a chicken as one’s property by biting one of its toes
• piya (Kalanga, Botswana) to hold a goat’s leg under one’s knee while milking it
• verotouaire (Gallo, France) a woman who helps a boar (vero) to copulate with the sow (tree)
• féauðnu-maðr (Old Icelandic) a man lucky with his sheep

Commanding

With this came a new range of calls and cries:

• ouk (British Columbian dialect, Canada) a command to a sledge-dog to turn right
• koosi (Buli, Ghana) to call chickens by smacking one’s tongue
• cethreinwr (Welsh) someone who walks backwards, in front of an ox, prompting it with a combination of a song and a sharp stick

To the hand

The Scots, in particular, have a fine collection of animal instructions:

• irrnout a shepherd’s call to his dog to pursue cattle
• who-yauds a call to dogs to pursue horses
• iss a call to a dog to attack
• hut a call to a careless horse
• re a call to a horse to turn to the right
• shug a call to a horse to come to the hand

On reflection

Animals online

In these days of intense email use, it seems amazing that there is still no official name for @. It is generally called the ‘at’ symbol. Other languages have come up with all kinds of mostly animal nicknames. Polish calls it malpa, monkey; in Afrikaans it is aapstert, monkey’s tail; in German it is Klammeraffe, clinging monkey. The Finns and Swedes see it as a cat curled up with its tail. Swedish has kattsvans, and Finnish has at least three names for this idea: kissanhántä, cat tail, miaumerkki, meow sign, and miukumauku, which means something like meow-meow. In French, Korean, Indonesian, Hebrew and Italian it’s a snail. In Turkish (kulak) and Arabic (uthun) it’s an ear, in Spanish it’s an elephant’s ear (elefantora), in Danish it’s an elephant’s trunk (snabel), and elsewhere:
zavinac (Czech) pickled herring
xiao lao-shu (Taiwanese) little mouse kukac (Hungarian) worm or maggot sobachka (Russian) little dog papaki (Greek) duckling griselahale (Norwegian) curly pig’s tail kanelbulle (Swedish) cinnamon roll gül (Turkish) rose

Aw, aw !

As does the Pashto language of Afghanistan and Pakistan:

drhey when addressing sheep eekh eekh when addressing camels asha asha when addressing donkeys aw aw when addressing oxen tsh tsh when addressing horses kutsh kutsh when addressing dogs

How to count on your chickens

In the Gallo dialect in France there is some very specific vocabulary about ensuring that there are always enough eggs:

- un anijouet an egg left in a hen’s nest to encourage it to lay more in the same place
- chaponner to stick a finger up a chicken’s bottom to see if it is laying an egg

Man’s best friend

It’s hardly surprising that that species thought of as closest to humans is described in the most loving detail:

- agkew (Manobo, Philippines) to try to snatch food which is hung up out of reach (said of a dog)
- manântsona (Malagasy, Madagascar) to smell or sniff before entering a house, as a dog does
- ihdaśna (Dakota, USA) to miss in biting oneself, as a dog trying to bite its own tail
- kwiiuia-iella (Yamana, Chile) to bite and leave, as a dog does with a strong animal it cannot kill
- amulaw (Bikol, Philippines) the barking of dogs in pursuit of game

Roof-gutter rabbit

Our second favourite animal is less loyal and more selfish, but brings us luck if it crosses our path:
• lapin de gouttière (French) a cat (literally, roof-gutter rabbit)
• echafouré (Gallo, France) a tickled cat hiding under a table or chair
• bilāra-nissăkkana (Pali, India) large enough for a cat to creep through
• amotóm (Cheyenne, USA) to carry something in the mouth (said especially of a mother cat)
• bvoko (Tsonga, South Africa) to spring unsuccessfully at or after, as a cat springs at a mouse which just saves itself

Gee gee

Next up has to be the one that has always helped us get around, and has also let us experience speed, excitement and other less welcome sensations:

• asvatthāma (Sanskrit) having the strength of a horse
• lekgetla (Setswana, Botswana) the droop of the ears of a tired horse
• dzādintsu (Telugu, India) to flap about as a horse does his tail, to reprove by speech
• cagait (Gaelic) a roll of chewed grass in a horse’s mouth
• ibihokcho (Alabama, USA) to pass gas in someone’s face (as a horse will)

Moo

Fourth on our list is free to roam in India, enjoying its sacred status, while elsewhere it offers sustenance of more than one kind:

• kārāmpasu (Tamil) a cow whose udder is black, held in great esteem by the Hindus
• nyakula (Lozi, Niger-Congo) to try to untie itself by kicking (as a cow tied up by its legs)
• silehile (Lozi, Niger-Congo) to besmirch with dung the teats of a cow which refuses to be milked, in order to keep its calf away
• deothas (Gaelic) the longing or eagerness of a calf for its mother
• clardingo (Welsh) to flee in panic from a warble-fly (said of a herd of cows)
• gokuradiya (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) the water in a hole made by a cow’s hoof

Drinking twice

We rarely see our fifth and last away from a zoo or safari park, but in the wild this creature certainly lives up to the poet’s description as ‘Nature’s great masterpiece’:

• dvi-pa (Sanskrit) an elephant (literally, drinking twice – with his trunk and his mouth)
• gagau (Malay) an elephant picking up with its trunk
• polak (Hindi) straw tied to the end of a bamboo stick which is used to frighten and restrain a furious elephant
• isikā (Sanskrit) an elephant’s eyeball
• tun-mada (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) an elephant in rut, alluding to the three liquids which exude from him in the rutting season, namely from his temples, his eyes and his penis

Flying low

And then there are those others that we admire, but generally only from a distance:

• arspan (Gaelic) the largest seagull
• tihunyi (Tsonga, South Africa) a crested cuckoo which sings before the rains and reminds people to collect firewood
• jimbi (Luvale, Zambia) a bird which does not yet sing
• sarad (Manobo, Philippines) to fly low, at about the height of a coconut palm
IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Don’t count your chickens before they’re hatched

Swahili advises us not to curse the crocodile before we’ve crossed the river and there are all kinds of similar warnings from around the world about not being too hasty:

mithl ilh yibi’ samak fi al bahar (Arabic) it’s like selling fish still in the sea man skal ikke sælge skindet, før bjørnen er skudt (Danish) one should not sell the fur before the bear has been shot älä nuolaise ennen kuin pöydällä tipahtaa (Finnish) don’t start licking it up before it drops onto the table guthimba ti kuura (Kikuyu, Kenya) having rain clouds is not the same as having rain na neroden Petko kapa mu skrole (Macedonian) they sewed a hat to Peter who is not born yet tsiplyat po oseni schitayut (Russian) one should count chicks in autumn ne govori gop, poka ne pereskochish (Russian) don’t say hop until you jumped over ino manga ondjupa ongombe inaayi vala (Ndonga, Namibia) don’t hang the churning calabash before the cow has calved non dire gatto se non l’hai nel sacc (Italian) never say ‘cat’ if you have not got it in your sack dereyi görmeden paçalari sivama (Turkish) do not roll up your trouser legs before you see the stream
Climate Change

gode ord skal du hogge i berg, de dårligere i snø (Norwegian) carve your good words in stone, the bad in snow

Tiwilight

The world goes round, and at innumerable different times, the day begins. Down in the Antipodes, the Tiwi people of northern Australia describe the sequence before the sun finally appears:

- arawunga early morning before dawn
- tokwampari early morning when birds sing
- yartijumurra darkness before daylight
- wujakari first light before sunrise

The dawn chorus

The Hungarians have a specific word – hajnalpir – for the first blush of dawn; the Japanese distinguish ariake, dawn when the moon is still showing; while the German word Morgengrauen (literally, morning greying) describes both the horror of the morning and its grey and sunless colour.

Sun’s up

In the Dakota language of the USA, the moon is hangyetuwi, the night-sun. Come dawn it can no longer compete with anpetuwi, the day-sun:

- glukocharazo (Greek) to glow in the dawn light
- tavanam (Tamil) the heat of the sun
- amaśtenaptapta (Dakota, USA) the glimmering of vapour in the sun’s heat
- greigh (Gaelic) the uncommon heat of the sun after bursting out from behind a cloud

Weather report

Ah, that famous topic, food for hundreds of thousands of conversations every day. And we are not alone in observing and describing its many moods:

- pestpokkenweer (Dutch) dirty rotten weather
- dul’avá (Virdainas, Baltics) fog with drizzle
- cilala (Bemba, Zambia) the dry spell in a rainy season
- boule (Scots) a gap, break; an opening in the clouds betokening fine weather
Postkartenwetter (German) the kind of weather that is too wonderful to be real (literally, postcard weather)

Heat haze

The secondary meanings of weather terms are often very evocative of the climate they describe. For instance, the Scots description of heat haze – summer-flaws – is also used for a swarm of gnats dancing in the air; while the Yamana of Chile unda-tu also describes the wavy appearance of the air seen over a fire.

The wind of change

Beautifully still conditions never last for long, certainly not in this country:

- pew (Scots) the least breath of wind or smoke; the least ripple on the sea
- sivisivivi (Mailu, Papua New Guinea) marks on water of a coming wind
- kacee (Tsonga, South Africa) to feel a breeze or smell coming towards one
- fuaradh-froik (Gaelic) the breeze preceding a shower

False friends

- dim (Bosnian) smoke
- estate (Italian) summer
- lung (Sherpa, Nepal) air
- santa (Bosnian) iceberg
- tall (Arabic) hill, elevation

Storm warning

We can always sense that moment when things are on the turn:

- oi (Vietnamese) to be sultry, muggy, hot and sticky
- tvanks (Virdainas, Baltics) stuffy air
- bingo (Chewa, South East Africa) the distant roll of thunder
- gwangalakwahla (Tsonga, South Africa) a thunderclap is very near
- kixansiksuya (Dakota, USA) to know by one’s feelings that unpleasant weather is due

Sunshine shower

After the storm, the rain is lighter, subtler; indeed, it may not be clear quite what’s going on:
• tmoq yungay (Aboriginal Tayal, Taiwan) a light rain (literally, monkey piss)
• fa-fa-fa (Tsonga, South Africa) to fall in a shower of drops
• mvula-tshikole (Venda, South Africa) rain with sunshine
• ördög veri a feleségét (Hungarian) the devil is hitting his wife (usually said when the sun is shining but rain is falling at the same time)
• bijregenboog (Dutch) a secondary rainbow

In a flood

Down on the ground, everything changes:

• douh (Somali) a dry watercourse which turns into a fast-moving stream after every downpour
• calalalala (Tsonga, South Africa) to come down, as a river in a flood; a glitter (of a large expanse of water or an army with polished weapons)
• tüvánam (Tamil) rain driven by the wind through the doors or windows
• zolilinga (Luvale, Zambia) the watermark made by rain (as on a wooden door)

Soaking up the weather

And all kinds of fun can be had:

• edtimbulan (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to walk in the rain
• wadlopen (Dutch) to walk sloshing through seamud
• chokok (Malay) to splash water in fun
• dynke (Norwegian) the act of dunking somebody’s face in snow
• kram snø (Norwegian) snow which is sticky (excellent for making snowballs and snowmen)

On reflection

You fish on your side...

Several places in Norway and Sweden are simply called Å. It means river in various Scandinavian languages, but that’s all the name tells us about them. But if you go for something rather longer, an awful lot of information can be contained in a name. For instance, Webster Lake in Massachusetts, USA, is also known as Chargoggagoggmanchauggagoggchaubunagungamaugg which was a native word for a neutral fishing place near a boundary, a meeting and fishing spot shared by several tribes. A popular interpretation is: ‘You fish on your side, I fish on my side, nobody fishes in the middle.’ The longest placename still in regular use is for a hill in New Zealand. The ninety-letter Maori name Taumatawhakatangihangakoauatamateaurehauturi pukapihimaungahoronukupokaiwhenuaakitanarahu means ‘The brow of the hill where Tamatea, the man with the big knees, who slid, climbed and ate mountains, the great traveller, sat and played on the flute to his beloved.’

Compass comparisons

The sun features strongly in how other cultures have described the compass points. The Mingo of the USA describe north as te’kææhkwææhkö, the sun isn’t there; and west as hekææhkwë’s, the sun habitually drops down over there. The Bambara people of Mali have more complicated associations:

- EAST is the colour white; the land of the dead and of wild and domestic animals.
- WEST is the land of the ‘sunset people’ and of birds; the source of custom and of all goodness and loveliness.
- NORTH is identified with the seventh heaven, a far distant country, the dwelling of the great god Faro, who created the world in all its present form; the north is the home of all water creatures – fish, crocodiles and frogs.
- SOUTH is peopled by plants and the evil beings whom Faro was forced to destroy at the beginning of time, because they had stolen speech from him; the home of pollution.

Coucher de soleil

Rain or shine, windy or still, the sun sinks down towards the horizon, and the day winds towards its close:

- tainunu (Gilbertese, Oceania) the time when shadows lengthen in the late afternoon
- pakupaku (Rapanui, Easter Island) to come down in a straight line like the rays of the sun
- sig (Sumerian, Mesopotamia) the colour of the low setting sun (reddish-yellow or gold)
- itaruskko (Finnish) sunset glow
- ahihi-ata (Rapanui, Easter Island) the last moments of light before nightfall

Silver goddess

Darkness falls, and the night-sun reappears, bringing with it mystery and magic:

- jyótsnā (Sanskrit) a moonlight night
- yakmoez (Turkish) the effect of moonlight sparkling on water
- kuunsilta (Finnish) the long reflection of the moon when it is low in the sky and shining on the calm surface of a lake (literally, moon bridge)
- hasi isititta-ammi (Alabama, USA) to bathe one’s face in the moon, wash the face four times in moonlight

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

It’s raining cats and dogs

ou vrouens met knopkieries reen (Afrikaans) it’s raining old women with clubs padaji trakaře (Czech) it’s raining wheelbarrows det regner skomagerdrenge (Danish) it’s raining shoemakers’ apprentices het regent pijpenstelen (Dutch) it’s raining pipestems baron mesleh dobeh asb mirized (Persian) it’s raining like the tail of the horse brékhei kareklopódara (Greek) it’s raining chair legs il pleut comme vache qui pisse (French) it’s raining like a pissing cow es regnet Schusterbuben (German) it’s raining young cobblers estan lloviendo hasta maridos (Spanish) it’s even raining husbands 20.

The Root of All Evil

ahjar habib fis-suq minn mitt skud fis-senduq (Maltese) a friend in the market is better than one hundred gold coins in the chest

A frog’s armpit

‘Don’t offer me advice, give me money,’ say the Spanish – and who would disagree, certainly if they’re in a tight spot financially:

- mas limpio que sobaco de rana (Venezuelan Spanish) broke (literally, cleaner than a frog’s armpit)

- auf den Hund kommen (German) to be broke (literally, to get to the dog; in medieval times, a dog was painted on the bottom of money chests – if you could see the dog, you had run out of money)
- n’avoir plus un radis (French) to be stone broke (literally, to be without a single radish)
- kukla (Russian) a roll of bills in which the inner bills have been replaced by worthless paper (literally, a doll)

Cutting gold

Most of us would be more than happy with an easy escape from such an unfortunate predicament:

- gaji buta (Malay) getting paid without having to work
- att skära guld med tälkniv (Swedish) to make money with very little effort (literally, to cut gold with a pocket knife)
- dawo (Yoruba, Nigeria, Benin and Togo) to produce money by magic

Gifted
While others find different ways to stay afloat:

- pakinim (Tagalog, Philippines) money given by a godparent
- hustrulon (Swedish) a wife’s salary
- namidakin (Japanese) a small amount of consolation money (literally, tear money)
- pujo (Korean) a congratulatory gift or condolence money

Up against it

It’s certainly true that the folding stuff can be elusive; and the occasion when you really need it may be the one time you are unable to find it:

- ipatapata (Lozi, Niger-Congo) to try hard to find money with which to make an urgent purchase
- lukupu (Mambwe, Zambia) to miss gaining riches by a narrow margin

On the floor

When you do finally get some, for heaven’s sake be careful with it:

- pagar el piso (Chilean Spanish) to take out all your friends and pay with the first pay packet from your new job (literally, to pay for the floor)
- madyelakhwirhini (Tsonga, South Africa) a man who immediately spends all he earns and sends nothing home; a spendthrift
- peaglatata (Dakota, USA) to exhaust one’s own supply by giving to others

It’s the thought that counts

To demonstrate their wealth, the Kwakutl Indians of Vancouver Island destroyed it. Their chiefs publicly burned food, blankets, canoes and ornaments in the ceremony of potlatch, a word that means ‘giving’. A potlatch might be held for a variety of reasons, which varied from group to group, but included puberty rites and death commemorations. It involved a great feast at which the host lavishly distributed valuable property to all the assembled guests. The hitch was that the guests had to reciprocate at some future date – with interest of up to 100 per cent.

An umbrella at midnight

Two proverbs from the Kannada language of Southern India speak eloquently of the paradoxes of getting rich. HalliddAga kaDle illa; kaDle iddAga hallilla – there are no nuts when one has teeth and there are no teeth when there are nuts; in other words, when you are young you have no money, and when you have money the chance of enjoying it is often gone. But perhaps this is all as it should be. For the second proverb points up the absurdity of some people’s behaviour when they are in a fit state to enjoy their money: Aishwarya bandre ardha rAthril koDe hiDkonDa – when a poor fellow gets rich, he has an umbrella over his head at midnight; which is to say that a newly wealthy man will flaunt the symbol of the well-off, a parasol to shield him from the sun, even in the dark.

False friends

- Reformhaus (German) health food store
- top (Dutch) done! agreed! it’s a bargain!
- stershit (Albanian) to sell everything that one has
- Detail (German) retail hamstring (Swedish) hoarding (derives from hamster)

male (Italian) bad, wicked

---

Cowherd’s cake

Sometimes the destitute may just have to make do with a payment in kind:

- legopelo (Setswana, Botswana) a piece of meat that is given to someone who has helped skin a cow
- angauriyā (Hindi) a ploughman making use of a farmer’s plough instead of receiving wages in money or kind
- bonnach-iomanach (Gaelic) a cowherd’s cake (a special reward for good herding at calving time)
- matao ni bwe (Gilbertese, Oceania) the price paid in fish for the loan of a canoe or fishing net

---

On reflection

To see thirty-six candles

The French refer to many things in terms of the number thirty-six:

- j’ai trente-six choses à faire I have many things to do
- tous les trente-six du mois once in a blue moon (literally, each thirty-sixth of the month)
- faire les trente-six volontés de quelqu’un to be at someone’s beck and call (literally, to do the thirty-six wills of someone)
- voir trente-six chandelles to see stars after getting hit on the head (literally, to see thirty-six candles)

---

Stall

‘Gol’ na vydamku khitra,’ say the Russians – poverty is crafty; and it’s surely true that having no money can become the spur for entrepreneurial activity, even of the most basic kind:

- bahu (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to barter food for money
- ditan (Chinese) a street vendor’s stand (with the goods spread out on the ground)
- higgler (Jamaican creole) a person selling fruit and vegetables by the roadside
- gujrī (Hindi) a roadside market set up in the late afternoons
- sitoa (Gilbertese, Oceania) a small trading ship whose decks are set up as stores
- chelnoki (Russian) shuttle traders (who buy goods from the back of lorries)
- limpiaparabrisas (Mexican Spanish) street kids who gather at intersections with traffic lights and rush to wash the windscreen of cars waiting for the lights to change and then demand to be paid

Red shells out, white shells back

The Kiriwina of the Trobriand Islands in the Pacific have an elaborate gift exchange system called the kula. The islanders set off round the islands in large, ocean-going canoes and trade red shell necklaces (veigun) in a clockwise direction, and white shell bracelets (mwali) in an anti-clockwise direction. The round trip is several hundred miles.

---

The art of selling

There’s a lot of skill (even magic) in encouraging people to part with their hard-earned dosh:

- spruik (Australian slang) to talk to attract customers; to hold forth like a showman
- verlierlen (Yiddish) to lose a customer to a fellow salesman
• vparivat’ (Russian) to palm off defective goods
• fare orecchie da mercante (Italian) pretending not to understand (literally, to have a merchant’s ears)
• palulud (Maguindanaon, Philippines) a charm that is supposed to have the power to attract customers

Smoke and mirrors

Although the further up the scale you go, the less need you have for actual goods:

• muhaqala (Arabic) the sale of grain while still in growth, dealing in grain futures
• dymoprodukt (Russian) an advertised product that is not yet being produced (literally, smoke product)
• wheeler (Scots) one who bids at an auction simply to raise the price

One-armed bandit

There are, of course, other ways of making money, if you’re prepared to take a chance:

• agi (Maranao, Philippines) to win continually in gambling
• airi (Maranao, Philippines) to bet again on a card which has just won
• an non (Vietnamese) to quit gambling as soon as one has won
• balato (Tagalog, Philippines) money given away by a winning gambler as a sign of goodwill

Losers

However, even the most hardened practitioners know that in the long run the betting tables don’t pay. As the Germans say, ‘Young gamblers, old beggars’:

• borona (Malagasy, Madagascar) having nothing with which to pay money lost in betting
• biho (Maranao, Philippines) a bet, money asked for from winners by losers
• pelasada (Maranao, Philippines) the percentage taken from bets by the owner of a gambling place

Tokyo tricks

The Japanese have two words to describe what happens as the temptation to cheat gets stronger:

• dakko the flicking movement of the palm that will send goods up into the sleeve
• dosa a player with an exceptionally bad hand who will flick a compromising card up his sleeve and quickly substitute a more favourable one

Retail therapy

So what to do with it when you finally have it? Why, hit the streets, of course; and this is an occupation, if not an art, in itself:

• faire du lèche-vitrines (French) to go window-shopping (literally, to lick windows)
• chokuegambo (Japanese) the wish that there were more designer-brand shops on a given street; the desire to buy things at luxury brand shops
• arimuhunán (Tagalog, Philippines) something worth taking although not needed
• emax (Latin) fond of buying

You’re safer with prison
What a fine array of products the world has in its shop window:

- Atum Bom Portuguese tinned tuna
- Bimbo Mexican biscuits
- Kevin French aftershave
- Polio Czech detergent
- Vaccine Dutch aftershave
- Flirt Austrian cigarettes
- Meltykiss Japanese chocolate
- Climax Kenyan disinfectant
- Hot Piss Japanese antifreeze spray
- Naked New Zealand fruit and nut bar
- Noisy French butter
- Last Climax Japanese tissues
- Happy Swedish chocolate
- Prison Ugandan body spray

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

As easy as falling off a log

så let som at klø sig i nakken (Danish) as easy as scratching the back of your neck semudah membalikkan telapak tangan (Indonesian) as easy as turning your palm around facile come bere un bicchier d’acqua (Italian) as easy as drinking a glass of water asameshi mae (Japanese) before breakfast (something that’s so easy, you could finish it before breakfast) nuwoseo tdeokmeokki (Korean) lying on one’s back and eating rice cakes tereyağýndan kýl çeker gibi (Turkish) as if pulling a strand of hair from butter ežiku ponjatno (Russian) understandable to a hedgehog
21. The Criminal Life

le diable chie toujours au même endroit (French) the devil always shits in the same place

Tea leaf

Why work, or even gamble for that matter, when there are far easier ways of enriching yourself?

- lipoushka (Russian) a stick with a gluey end for stealing money from a counter (literally, flypaper)
- butron (Spanish) a type of jacket with inner pockets worn by shoplifters
- levare le scarpe (Italian) to steal the tyres from a car (literally, to take someone else’s shoes off)
- rounstow (Scots) to cut off the ears of a sheep, and so obliterate its distinctive marks of ownership

False friends

- bait (Arabic) incentive or motive
- egg (Norwegian, Swedish) knife edge
- gulp (Afrikaans) to slit, gush, spout
- guru (Japanese) a partner in crime
- plaster (Hebrew) deceitful or fraudulent
- roof (Dutch) robbery

Gangland

Although once you step over that line, who knows what company you may be forced to keep:

- ladenlichter (Dutch) a till-robber
- pisau cukur (Malay) a female hustler who cons men into giving her money
- harza-duzd (Persian) someone who steals something of no use to him or anyone else
- adukalipewo (Mandinka, West Africa) a highway robber (literally, give me the purse)
- belochnik (Russian) a thief specializing in stealing linen off clothes lines (this was very lucrative in the early 1980s)

Scissorhand

Considerable skill, experience and bravado may be required for success:
- forbice (Italian) pickpocketing by putting the index and middle fingers into the victim’s pocket (literally, scissors)
- cepat tangan (Malay) quick with the hands (in pickpocketing or shoplifting or hitting someone)
- poniwata (Korean) a victim who at first glance looks provincial and not worth robbing, but on closer scrutiny shows definite signs of hidden wealth
- komissar (Russian) a robber who impersonates a police officer

And sometimes even magic:

- walala (Luvale, Zambia) a thieves’ fetish which is supposed to keep people asleep while the thief steals
- za-koosirik (Buli, Ghana) a person who transfers the plants of a neighbour’s field to his own by magic

Lost in translation

In their eagerness to move into and conquer new markets, many huge Western companies forgot to do their homework. When the name Microsoft was first translated into Chinese, they went for a literal translation of the two parts of the name which, unfortunately, meant ‘small and flaccid’.

Pepsi’s famous slogan ‘Come Alive with Pepsi’ was dropped in China after it was translated as ‘Pepsi brings your ancestors back from the grave’.

When American Airlines wanted to advertise its new leather first-class seats in the Mexican market, it translated its ‘Fly in Leather’ campaign literally, but vuela en cuero meant ‘Fly Naked’ in Spanish.

Colgate introduced in France a toothpaste called Cue, the name of a notorious pornographic magazine.

Coca-Cola was horrified to discover that its name was first read by the Chinese as kekoukela, meaning either ‘bite the wax tadpole’ or ‘female horse stuffed with wax’, depending on the dialect. Coke then researched 40,000 characters to find a phonetic equivalent – kokou koe – which translates as ‘happiness in the mouth’

Kindling

Their trains and tubes are punctual to the nearest second; equal efficiency seems to characterize those Japanese who take criminal advantage of such crowded environments:

- nakanuku, inside pull-out: to carefully slip one’s hand into a victim’s trouser pocket, draw out the wallet, flick it open, whip out cash and credit cards, close it and slip it back into the victim’s trouser pocket
• oitore, walking next to a well-dressed victim, plunging a razor-sharp instrument into his attaché case and cutting the side open
• okinagashi, put and flow: those who climb on a local train at one station, grab bags and coats, cameras and camcorders, and then jump off at the following station
• takudasu, kindle and pull out: to drop, as if by mistake, a lit cigarette into a victim’s jacket or open shirt, and then, while the victim is frantically trying to locate the burning butt, come to his aid, helping him unbutton and frisk through jacket, shirt and undershirt, taking the opportunity to lift wallets and other valuables out of pockets and bags

Descending spiders

Nor does this fine vocabulary dry up when describing the activity of Japanese burglars: maemakuri, lifting the skirt from the front, means they enter through the front gates; while shirimakuri, lifting the skirt from behind, describes entry through a gate or fence at the rear of the house. One obvious hazard is the gabinta, the dog, that starts barking or snarling at the intruders (the word literally means ‘this animal has no respect for its superiors’). There is only one way to deal with such an obstacle: inukoro o abuseru, the deadly pork chop, otherwise known as shū tome o kudoku, silencing one’s mother-in-law. Once at the door you confront the mimochi musume, the lock (literally, the pregnant daughter), who must be handled with the softest of touches, unless of course you are in possession of the nezumi, the mice (or master keys).

As for the crooks themselves, they come in all varieties. There is the sagarigumo, or descending spider, the man or woman who braves the slippery tiles of the roof to reach their target; the denshinkasegi, the telegram breadwinners, who get there by shinning up telephone poles; the shinobikomi, thieves who enter crawling; the odorikomi, who enter ‘dancing’, i.e. brash criminals with guns; the mae, or fronts, debonair thieves who simply walk up to the main door; or the super-sly ninkātā, who leaves no trace: the master thief.

There is the ichimaimono, the thief who works alone; and the hikiai, those who pull together, i.e. partners in crime. There are nitchū shi, broad-daylight specialists, and yonashi, night specialists; even miyashi, shrine specialists. There are akisunerai, empty-nest targeters, those who specialize in targeting unattended houses; neshi, sleep specialists, the men who target bedrooms after the loot has been assembled and packed; and even evil tsukeme, literally, touching eyes: thieves who barge into bedrooms to rape sleeping victims.

Radish with glasses

Not content with colourful descriptions of robbers, the Japanese have an extensive vocabulary for cops too: there are the gokiburi, the cockroaches, policemen on motorcycles, who can follow burglars over pavements and through parks; the kazaguruma, the windmill, an officer who circles the streets and alleys, getting closer and closer to the area where the criminals are working; the daikon megane, the radish with glasses, the naive young officer who’s not going to be a problem for the experienced crook; or the more problematic oji, the uncle, the dangerous middle-aged patrolman who knows all the members of the gang by name and is liable to blow the whistle first and ask questions later.

As if that wasn’t enough, policemen on those overcrowded islands can also be described as aobuta (blue pigs), en (monkeys), etekō (apes), karasu (crows), aokarasu (blue crows), itachi (weasels), ahiru (ducks), hayabusa (falcons), ahō dori (idiotic birds, or albatrosses), kē (dogs), barori (Korean for pig), and koyani (cat, from the Korean koyangi). Officers even turn into insects such as hachi (bees), dani (ticks), mushi (bugs), and kejirami (pubic lice).
When crimes go wrong

‘Punishment,’ say the Spanish, ‘is a cripple, but it arrives.’ Criminals may get away with it for a while, but in the end justice of some kind generally catches up with them:

- chacha (Korean) the disastrous act of each gang member dashing down a different alley
- afersata (Amharic, Ethiopia) the custom, when a crime is committed, of rounding up all local inhabitants in an enclosure until the guilty person is revealed
- andare a picco (Italian) to sink (to be wanted by the police)
- cizyatiko (Mambwe, Zambia) to make a man believe that he is safe so as to make time for others to arrest him
- panier à salade (French) a salad shaker (a police van)
- annussāveti (Pali, India) to proclaim aloud the guilt of a criminal

Pig box

All except the perpetrator are happy to see that anyone taking the immoral shortcut to personal enrichment ends up in a very bad place:

- obez’ yannik (Russian) a detention ward in a police station (literally, monkey house)
- butabako (Japanese) the cooler, clink (literally, pig box)
- bufala (Italian) a meat ration distributed in jail (literally, shebuffalo – so called because of its toughness)

Into the pit

And society may exact its just deserts:

- gbaa ose (Igbo, Nigeria) to rub in pepper by way of punishment or torture
- kitti (Tamil) a kind of torture in which the hands, ears or noses of culprits are pressed between two sticks
- dhauti (Sanskrit) a kind of penance (consisting of washing a strip of white cloth, swallowing it and then drawing it out of the mouth)
- ráhu-mukhaya (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a punishment inflicted on criminals in which the tongue is forced out and wrapped in cloth soaked in oil and set on fire
- barathrum (Ancient Greek) a deep pit into which condemned criminals were thrown to die
- tu-tú (Vietnamese) a prisoner ready for the electric chair

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

As thick as thieves

- aralarindan su sizmaz (Turkish) not even water can pass between them
- entendre comme cul et chemise (French) to get along like one’s buttocks and shirt
- uni comme les doigts de la main (French) tied like the fingers of a hand
- una y carne ser como (Spanish)/como una y mugre (Mexican Spanish) to be fingernail and flesh/like a fingernail and its dirt
- sange paye ghazwin (Persian) as thick as volcanic stone Realpolitik

em rio que tem piranha, jacaré nada de costas (Brazilian Portuguese) in a piranha-infested river, alligators do backstroke

Pipe and sunshade

Once upon a time life was straightforward: the chief ran the show and everyone fell in behind:

- pfhatla-pfhatla (Tsonga, South Africa) to make a present to the chief to abate his anger
- tarrique-zan (Persian) an officer who clears the road for a prince
- chātra (Pali, India) one who carries his master’s sunshade
- vwatika (Mambwe, Zambia) to place the pipe in the mouth of the chief
- kapita mwene (Mambwe, Zambia) the time of the stroll taken by the chief (between 9 and 10 p.m., when everyone had retired, the chief would go about quietly, eavesdropping to find out those talking about him)
- magani (Mindanao, Philippines) the custom of obtaining leadership and the right to wear red clothes through killing a certain number of people
- tirai (Tamil) a tribute paid by one king to another more powerful
- ramanga (Betsileo, Madagascar) a group of men whose business is to eat all the nail-parings and to lick up all the spilt blood of the nobles (literally, blue blood)
- mangkat (Indonesian) to die for one’s king or queen

A gift

Things weren’t so great for those at the bottom of the pile, however interesting their duties:

- ravey (Manobo, Philippines) to enslave someone because he didn’t obey a command
- dapa (Malay) a slave-messenger sent as a gift with a proposal of marriage
- dayo (Bikol, Philippines) a slave who stands guard over the grave of a leading member of the community so that the body will not be disinterred by sorcerers
- pachal (Malay) a slave of a slave
- golamkhana (Bengali) a factory for imbuing people with a slave mentality

False friends

tank (Tocharic, Turkey) to interfere tilts (Latvian) bridge
Transparent (German) banner, placard bingo (Kapampangan, Philippines) chip in a blade doshman (Romani) enemy
Changing shirts

Democracy freed us from the old hierarchies and gave us the power to choose our own destinies …

- valboskap (Swedish) ignorant voters (who vote as they are told)
- qualunquismo (Italian) an attitude of indifference to political and social issues
- apocheirotonesis (Ancient Greek) a rejection by a show of hands
- chaquetero (Central American Spanish) someone who changes political ideas as easily as changing shirts
- porros (Mexican Spanish) thugs who stand around polling stations and intimidate voters

Full poodle

… with leaders directly answerable to us and our interests:

- phak kanmuang (Thai) political parties that become active only during or prior to elections
- Politpopper (German) politically correct and correctly dressed (literally, a square politician)
- göra en hel Pudel (Swedish) a politician, or some other well-known person who has done something bad, publicly admitting being bad but promising not to do it again and humbly asking for forgiveness (literally, do a full poodle)

Muffled

Perhaps we just have to accept that the political mindset is never going to change that radically:

- aincātānī (Hindi) the manipulation and manoeuvring, tugging and pulling, a struggle inspired by selfish motives
- ficcarsi (Italian) to get access to a group to gain advantages from them
- başına çorap örmek (Turkish) to plot against someone (literally, to knit a sock for the head)

- akal bulus (Indonesian) a cunning ploy (literally, a turtle’s trick)
- akarnok (Hungarian) someone with unscrupulous ambition

Power corrupts

It’s commonly accepted that there are all kinds of unofficial extra benefits to being in power. The phrase in the Sinhala language of Sri Lanka for a local member of parliament, dheshapaalana adhikaari, also means crook and someone born out of wedlock:

- sglaism (Gaelic) a great deal of the good things of life acquired in a questionable way
• dedocratico (Spanish) an undemocratic appointment to a governmental position
• zalatwic (Polish) using acquaintances to accomplish things unofficially
• bal tutan parmagini yalar (Turkish proverb) a person who holds the honey licks his finger (a person given a job involving valuables will gain some benefit for himself)
• kazyonno kozla za khyost poderzhat – mozno shibu sshit’ (Russian proverb) just even from having once held a state goat’s tail one can make a fur coat (i.e. an official can make money by bribes)

On reflection

Tail between legs

Many everyday English words are derived from other languages. Finding out more about their roots often casts a fascinating new light on the word itself:

- accolade derives from the French accoler (to embrace) because knighthoods were initially conferred with an embrace
- agony comes from the Ancient Greek agonia (contest): the athletes in training for the Olympic Games put their bodies through intense discipline to reach the peak of fitness, denying themselves normal pleasures and enduring punishing physical tests
- coward comes from the Old French couard (tail) and thus we have the image of a dog retreating with its tail between its legs
- jargon comes from the Old French word jargoun (twittering), the sound made by birds, incomprehensible to others
- muscle is descended from the Latin word musculus (little mouse), a rather apt description of the moving and changing form under the skin, especially of the arms and legs

Talk box

The language of politics is famous for both rollo (Spanish), the long boring speech (literally, a paper roll), and for double speak. All round the world it’s very important to listen extremely closely to what politicians say – and to what they don’t:

- borutela (Tsonga, South Africa) to praise another in his presence but malign him behind his back
- feleka (Setswana, Botswana) to speak so as to conceal one’s meaning; to be intentionally ambiguous
- chindugirathu (Tamil) to give a sign by pressing with the finger, unobserved by any third party
- tok bokkis (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) a way of giving words hidden meanings (literally, talk box)
- achakiy (Quechuan, Andes) to say one thing and do something else

Problem solving

The Bambuti people of Congo have no chiefs or formal system of government; problems and disputes are solved by general discussion often involving the use of humour. Elsewhere, people have other ways of achieving agreement:

- taraadin (Arabic) a compromise; a way of solving a problem without anyone losing face
- mochi (Chinese) the rapport or teamwork that enables people to cooperate smoothly (literally, silent contract)
- remettre les pendules à l’heure (French) to re-align something, for example, in establishing who is the boss, or how we work (literally, to set the clocks at the right time again)
- biritululo (Kiriwani, Papua New Guinea) comparing yams to settle a dispute War elephants

What a shame that such delightful methods can’t be universally employed. But from the start of time dispute-resolution has often been alarmingly violent:

- gazi (Mauritanian dialect) a plundering raid in which at least forty camels are employed
- faluromboláš (Hungarian) the destruction of villages
- Schrecklichkeit (German) a deliberate policy of terrorizing non-combatants
- edsabil (Maguindanaon, Philippines) to fight until death for the cause of Allah
- nuulone (Anywa, Nilo-Saharan) a victory dance with rifles after a war

Cancer forces

All that’s changed over the years is the deadliness of the weapons used:

- dagadaga (Sranan Tongo, Surinam) a machine gun
- plofstof (Afrikaans) explosive (literally, puff/bang stuff)
- springstof (Dutch) an explosive (literally, jump matter)
- rakovye voziska (Russian) strategic missile forces (literally, cancer forces – referring to the numerous cancerous diseases caused by radiation)

Heroes

On the battlefield itself individuals make extraordinary sacrifices …

- lwa manyanga (Mambwe, Zambia) to fight one another crawling along on all fours
- mamakakaua (Hawaiian) the leading man in battle who bears the brunt of the fighting
- ohiampunut (Finnish) one who has survived in battle (literally, shot/fired past)
- abhí-vī ra (Sanskrit) surrounded by heroes

Yellow-bellies

… or not, as the case may be:

- ngivhe (Venda, South Africa) to hit with the butt-end of a spear (a blow given as a warning to escape)
- rafizat (Persian) a body of soldiers who deserted their commander and retreated
- imboscarsi (Italian) to lie in ambush, to evade military service, to avoid working, or to retreat to a secluded place to make love (literally, to take to the woods)
- palias (Maranao, Philippines) the power or magic which protects its possessor from a bullet in battle
- Handschihschneeballwerfer (German) somebody who wears gloves to throw snowballs – used in general for all cowards

War trophies

There are no limits to cruelty, savagery and treachery:

- liput (Manobo, Philippines) to throw someone off guard, through an appearance of goodwill, in order to kill him
- usauura (Yamana, Chile) to shout, as a group of men, when ready to make an assault on someone they intend to kill
- áhaneoha’ov (Cheyenne, USA) to kill someone by stepping on him
- tsantsa (Jivaro, Ecuador) a human head shrunken and dried as a war trophy
- tzompantli (Aztec) a rack of skulls Legacy

But when it’s all over, what are we left with?

- aidos (Ancient Greek) the understanding of the need for humility at the point of victory
- Gleichgültigkeit (German) the feeling of dreadful moral insensibility and detachment which is a peculiar legacy of wars

Cucumbers and shaving brushes

And, all too often, a large standing army. Who better than the Russians to tell us all about the realities of that sort of organization?

- ogourets a soldier in his first six months of service (literally, a cucumber – referring to the colour green, which signifies inexperience)
- pomazok a soldier who has served more than one year and is therefore released from certain menial tasks (literally, a shaving brush)
- chelovek-amfibiya a soldier on dishwashing duty (literally, an amphibian man)

- khoronit’ okourok a punishment for soldiers who drop their cigarette butts on the ground; when even one such butt is found all soldiers are woken up in the middle of the night and forced to spend hours digging deep holes to bury individual butts
- lekarstvo ot lyubvi two years of army service (literally, a cure for love, meaning that girlfriends rarely wait for soldiers to come home)

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Something is rotten in the state of Denmark

- hay un gato encerrado (Spanish) there’s a cat shut up
- les dés sont pipés (French) the dice are cheated
- il y a anguille sous roche (French) there is an eel under the rock
- iskat’ igolku v stoge sena (Russian) there is a needle in the haystack
- hayya min taht tibn (Arabic) a snake under the hay
Dios es el que sana, y el medico lleva la plata (Spanish)
God cures the patient and the doctor pockets the fee

Fagged out

We have all kinds of habits that aren’t exactly good for us. As the Italian proverb cheerily goes: ‘Bacco, tabacco e Venere, riducon l’uomo in cenere’, Bacchus, tobacco and Venus make men into ashes:

- Glimmstengel (German) a cigarette (literally, a glowing stick)
- pitillo (Spanish) a cigarette (literally, a small whistle)
- bychkovat’ (Russian) to smoke only part of a cigarette so as to save the butt
- sassakisisbingweiabs (Ojibway, North America) feeling a burning pain in my eyes from too much smoke

Peaky

The simplest symptoms can announce forthcoming suffering:

- hi (Rapanui, Easter Island) to have a headache or to blow one’s nose
- kirukiruppu (Tamil) dizziness
- cloch (Scots) to cough frequently and feebly
- koodho (Anywa, Nilo-Saharan) to fart repeatedly
- ku-susuquirra (Ganda, Uganda) to feel the first shivers of a fever
- svimfardig (Swedish) ready to faint
- motami-ella (Yamana, Chile) to go home or to a place eastwards and throw up

Hypo

Some people are more likely to succumb to illness than others:

- niba n aoraki (Gilbertese, Oceania) a person very susceptible to catching every disease
- mabuk darah (Malay) one who becomes sick upon seeing blood
- wakakhatakeca (Dakota, USA) one who is made sick by a little matter, one who is nervous
- arattam (Tamil) the anxiety of a sick person

STD

Love is often described using the terminology of disease, as with dongai (Fijian) love sickness; while sex is seen both as a cause of sickness and as a cure:
- pham-phòng (Vietnamese) to become sick after having intercourse
- una cachiaspirina (Chilean Spanish) refers to how one will sweat heavily during sex and thus kill a cold

Sweating carrots

All too soon things become more serious:

- zweet peentjes (Dutch) sweating like a pig (literally, sweating carrots)
- fare i gattini (Italian) to vomit (literally, to make the kittens)
- ca-ca-ca (Tsonga, South Africa) to have diarrhoea; to rain heavily
- sarar burer (Chorti, Guatemala) a fever accompanied by an itch
- útsu (Telugu, India) the falling out of the hair from sickness
- oka/shete (Ndonga, Namibia) urination difficulties caused by eating frogs before the rain has duly fallen
- kinudegan (Maguindanaon, Philippines) a disease in men that causes the penis to retract inside the body

Quack remedies

Routine must be interrupted and steps must be taken:

- krankfeiern (German) to call in sick (literally, to celebrate illness)
- tombola (Kalanga, Botswana) to extract a thorn from flesh using a safety pin
- tervismuda (Estonian) curative mud
- verkwakzalveren (Dutch) to spend money on quack remedies
- kudóripannugirathu (Tamil) to slit or cut the top of the head in order to put in medicine to cure dangerous diseases

Docteur, docteur

Few enjoy handing themselves over to doctors, but sometimes it’s unavoidable; or, as they say in France, inévitable:

- trente-trois say ah! (literally, thirty-three – said by a doctor to the patient)
- artilleur de la pièce humide a male nurse (literally, artilleryman of the wet gun)
- passer sur le billard to undergo surgery (literally, to go onto the billiard table)

Surgical spirit

In some societies recommended cures may not be primarily medical:

- millu (Quechuan, Andes) a rock of aluminium sulphate used by witch doctors, who diagnose illnesses by analysing its colour change when it is thrown into a fire ti-luoiny (Car, Nicobar Islands) to call on the spirit of a sick man to return tawák (Tagalog, Philippines) a quack doctor with magic saliva anavinakárâyá (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a juggler, one who practises incantations upon persons who have been poisoned or bitten by a serpent i'dahli (Alabama, USA) to cut stripe marks on, in order to suck out blood (applied to a hexed or sick person)

Hex

A Chilote Indian, who has gathered up the spittle of an enemy, will put it in a potato, hang it in the smoke, and utter certain spells in the belief that his enemy will waste away as the potato dries in the smoke. And many others, likewise, believe that one person can be responsible for another’s physical decline:

khmungha (Dakota, USA) to cause sickness or death in a supernatural way

The devil’s in the detail

If it’s an evil spirit to blame, it will need to be expelled. Methods differ:

tin-fu-ko (Car, Nicobar Islands) the driving out of the devil from a man by beating the ground with the thick stubs of a coconut leaf sosela (Tsonga, South Africa) to cure a person by exorcism through the beating of drums phurbu (Tibetan) ceremonial nails with which evil demons are symbolically nailed fast and banished

On reflection

Corpse in the middle

The Koreans, Japanese and Chinese (both in Cantonese and Mandarin) avoid the number 4 since in all these languages it has a very similar pronunciation to the word for death. Chinese and Korean buildings often do not have a fourth floor, replacing the number 4 (sa) with the letter F. This is not the only number that the Chinese are wary of: the number 1414 is especially avoided because when spoken it sounds just like the words ‘definite death, definite death’. Many traditional Chinese people believe that having an uneven number of people in a photograph brings bad luck. To have three people is of greater consequence as the person in the middle will die.

Recuperation

With luck, however outlandish it is, the cure will work and time will do the rest:

mimai (Japanese) to visit a sick person in the hospital hletela (Tsonga, South Africa) to help a sick person to walk; to lead, as a hen does her chickens samaya (Maguindanaon, Philippines) a party held to celebrate the promised cure for someone who is sick i'sobáayli (Alabama, USA) to have the feeling come back to a body part amū lha-vinaya (Pali, India) an acquittal on the grounds of restored sanity

Curtains

But nothing can ever be taken for granted:

doí (Vietnamese) to make one’s last recommendations before death urdhwaswása (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) the rattling in the throat which precedes death agonia (Spanish) the dying breath
• sa-soa (Bakweri, Cameroon) a comb; to make deathbed statements as to the disposition of property

Clogs and slippers

We kick the bucket or turn up our toes. The Russians play the snake, throw their hooves outwards, glue up their slippers, or throw out their best skates. The theme of no longer being shod and upright on your feet is widespread …

• estirar la pata (Latin American Spanish) to stretch out your leg
• colgar los tenis (Mexican Spanish) to hang up or hand in your tennis shoes
• at stille træskoene (Danish) to put aside the clogs
• zaklepat bačkorama (Czech) to bang together a pair of slippers
• oikaiista koipensa (Finnish) to straighten one’s shanks
• nallari havaya dikmek (Turkish) to raise horse shoes to the sky

… but not exclusive:

• gaan bokveld toe (Afrikaans) to go to the goat field
• cerrar el paraguas (Costa Rican Spanish) to close the umbrella
• liar el petate (Spanish) to roll up the sleeping mat
• passer l’arme a gauche (French) to pass the firearm to the left
• ins Gras beißen (German) to bite into the grass
• a da colțul (Romanian) to turn around the corner
• hälsa hem (Swedish) to send home one’s regards
• irse al patio de los callados (Chilean Spanish) to go to the courtyard of the hushed
• ya kwanta dama (Hausa, Nigeria) he is lying on his right arm (Muslims are buried not lying on their backs but on the right arm facing the Kaabah)

A thousand cuts

To die of an illness is not ideal, but in comfortable surroundings, with loved ones around us, perhaps better than some of the alternatives:

• lepur (Malay) to die through suffocation in mud
• asa (Korean) death from starvation
• áhano’xéohtsé (Cheyenne, USA) to die from carrying a load
• skeelah (Hebrew) stoning to death
• lang-trī (Vietnamese) death by a thousand cuts (an ancient punishment)
• prayopaveshī (Hindi) one who undertakes a fast unto death
• chōngsa (Korean) love suicide, double suicide
• fwa infwa leza (Mambwe, Zambia) to die abandoned and alone (without having anyone to fold one’s arms and legs for the burial)
• lavu (Manobo, Philippines) to drown someone by overturning their canoe

Another way to go

The Fore tribe of New Guinea suffer from a terrible disease called kuru, which means shaking death. It is also known as the laughing sickness from the disease’s second stage in which the sufferers laugh uncontrollably. It has a 100 per cent fatality rate.

Stiff

There’s no saving us now; the best we can hope for is a little dignity:
• tlanyi (Tsonga, South Africa) to find a person lying dead when one thought him alive
• bahk’ e chamen (Chorti, Guatemala) the fright caused by looking at a corpse
• kreng (Dutch) a dead body which is bloated from being submerged in water for a substantial period of time (also a bitch)
• gruz 200 (Russian) corpses transported by air (literally, load 200)

False friends

arm (Estonian) scar cocoa (Nahuatl, Mexico) to suffer pain halal (Hungarian) death kill (Amharic, Ethiopia) skull kiss (Swedish) pee men (Thai) a bad smell rib (Somali) contraction rat (Romani) blood
safari (Zarma, Nigeria) medicine wish (Bashgali, India) poison; medicine

Feet first

Every culture attaches importance to a respectful disposal of the dead; but how exactly they do it is different all over:

• vynosit’ (Russian) to bury someone (literally, to carry someone out feet first)
• monoklautos (Ancient Greek) with one mourner
• tomboka (Luvale, Zambia) to dance (said of an executioner)
• sahagamanamu (Telugu, India) the burning alive of a widow, with her dead husband
• Leichenschmaus (German) the meal after the funeral (literally, corpse banquet)

• xuxo (Tsonga, South Africa) the spot where an important man died; when rites are observed for his spirit, people go first to that place, then to his grave

Funeral crashers

‘A beautiful funeral does not necessarily lead to paradise,’ runs a Creole proverb and, were we still able to care, such a thought might be reassuring:

• tumeakana (Yamana, Chile) to not show the grief for a friend who has died that is expected from relatives, to act when a mourner as though one was not a mourner
• pesamentheiro (Portuguese) one who habitually joins groups of mourners at the home of a deceased person, ostensibly to offer condolences but in reality to partake of the refreshments which he expects will be served

In loving memory

Now all that’s left is for those who remain to remember and express their feelings:

• di-huong (Vietnamese) the memory of a dead lover
• keriah (Hebrew) a tear in clothes to signify a broken heart
• miàti-drànomàso (Malagasy, Madagascar) to go up to the palace to weep on the decease of the sovereign
• nyekar (Indonesian) to visit and lay flowers on the grave of a dead relative or friend
• prátahsmaraniya (Hindi) worthy of being remembered every morning; revered
• yortsayt (Yiddish) the anniversary of someone’s death

Hex revenge

While some love and remember, there are others who believe that if someone is ill and dies there must be someone to blame; and appropriate action may have to be taken:

• rihehlo (Tsonga, South Africa) a spell cast upon a person by putting medicines on the grave of one killed by his witchcraft

Radish tips

Once under the ground we say we are ‘pushing up daisies’. For the French, though, to be dead and buried is either engraisser les asticots, fattening the maggots, or manger les pissenlits par la racine, eating dandelions by the roots. Even more imaginatively the Germans have sich die Radieschen von unten angucken, he’s looking at the radishes from below.

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

Out of the frying pan and into the fire

- min taht al dalf lataht al mizrab (Arabic) from under the drip to under the spout
- dostat se z bláta do louie (Czech) out of the mud into the puddle
- aasmaan se gire khajoor mein atke (Hindi) down from the skies into the date tree
- takut akan lumpur lari ke duri (Indonesian) afraid of mud, escape to thorns
- sudah jatuh tertimpa tangga pula (Indonesian) already fallen and hit by the stairs as well
- lepas dari mulut harimau masuk ke mulut buaya (Indonesian) freed from the tiger’s mouth to enter the crocodile’s mouth
- iz ognya da v polymya (Russian) from fire to flame
- yağmurdan kaçarken doluya yakalanmak (Turkish) caught by the hail while running away from the rain
The Great Beyond

człowiek strzela, Pan Bóg kule nosi (Polish)
man shoots, God carries the bullets

So where do we go once the body has been burned, buried or, as with the Zoroastrian Parsees of India, pecked off the skeleton by vultures? It’s hard for us to believe that the particular vitality that once animated the face of a loved one hasn’t gone somewhere:

- hanmdohdaka (Dakota, USA) to tell of one’s intercourse with the spiritual world, to speak unintelligibly
- dagok (Malay) clouds on the horizon of weird and changing form (believed to be ghosts of murdered men)
- beina-fœrsla (Old Icelandic) the removal of bones (from one churchyard to another)

Fancy meeting you again

For Hindus, Buddhists and Native Americans, among others, the afterlife is not necessarily another place:

- gatâgati (Sanskrit) going and coming, dying and being born again
- púsápalan panninavan (Tamil) one who in the present life receives the reward of merit acquired in a former state
- apagabbha (Pali, India) not entering another womb (i.e. not destined for another rebirth)
- tihanmdeya (Dakota, USA) to have been acquainted in a former state of existence

Just a jealous guy

For others, the spirits of the dead may well stick around and remain animate enough to be called on in times of need:

- hanmde (Dakota, USA) to have intercourse with the spirit world
- zangu (Luvale, Zambia) a dance to immunize an adulterous woman to the spirit of her dead husband
- ngar (Kaurna Warra, Australia) the call of a dead person
- kuinyo (Kaurna Warra, Australia) the voice of the dead
- andoa (Bakweri, Cameroon) to invoke spirits by spitting out the juice of leaves
- havu (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to make an offering to a ghost

False friends

- sad (Sanskrit) being
- pop (Bosnian) priest
- bigot (French) sanctimonious
Holy cockerel

Sometimes mere spirits aren’t enough and stronger supernatural agents have to be called on. Many and varied are the prayers and rituals offered to the world’s deities:

- kahók (Tagalog, Philippines) the act of dipping fingers in holy water
- a-cāmati (Sanskrit) to sip water from the palm of one’s hand for purification
- hacer (se) cruces (Latin American Spanish) to cross yourself in the hope that God will help you to understand.
- thi thup (Vietnamese) to go down on one’s knees then get up again, to make repeated obeisances
- kiam (Malay) to stand during prayer
- anda (Latin American Spanish) a wooden frame for carrying images of saints in processions
- miau (Iban, Sarawak and Brunei) to wave a cockerel over a person while uttering a prayer

Broken sewing needles

Many and varied too are the building of their shrines and how they are decorated:

- abhi-gamana (Sanskrit) the act of cleansing and smearing with cowdung the way leading to the image of the deity
- laplap bilong alta (Tok Pisin, Papua New Guinea) an altar cloth
- hari kuyo (Japanese) a shrine for broken sewing needles (out of respect for the tools of the sewing trade)
- tintueta-wen (Buli, Ghana) the personal god of a living or dead person whose shrine has not yet been transferred to the front of the house
- bit torng lāng prā (Thai) doing a good deed in secret (literally, pasting gold leaf onto the back of the Buddha image)

One who understands

In most cultures, one spirit stands pre-eminent above all others and is always the One to be both consulted and worshipped:

- Hawēniyu’ (Mingo, USA) God (literally, he is the one whose word/voice is good)
- oluponron (Yoruba, Nigeria, Benin and Togo) one who understands people’s problems, God

Candle cormorant
'He who is near the church is often far from God,' say the French; and there is always a risk of substituting religiosity for virtue:

- hywl (Welsh) religious or emotional fervour, as experienced with preaching, poetry reading, sporting events, etc.
- une grenouille de bénitier (French) an extremely devout churchwoman (literally, a frog of the holy-water basin)
- Kerzlschlucker (Austrian German) an insufferably pious person who never misses a mass (literally, a candle cormorant)

On a hedgehog’s back

The English language is full of relics of our former, more religious days. The expression ‘crikey’ is a truncation of the oath ‘by Christ’s key’ and ‘bloody’ of ‘by our Lady’. Socrates swore ni ton kuna, by the dog; and Pythagoras is said to have sworn ma tin tetrakton, by the number four. Even atheistic Baudelaire swore by the sacred St Onion. The following expressions of astonished disbelief are just as outlandish:

- Kors i taket! (Swedish) Cross in the ceiling! (used when something rare happens)
- Toushite svet, vynosite chemodany! (Russian) Switch off the light and take out your suitcases! (used when something is a great surprise)
- Holla die Waldfee! (German) Ooh, the forest’s fairy! (exclamation of surprise, often with an ironic connotation)
- In groppa al riccio! (Italian) On a hedgehog’s back! (the response to which is Con le mutande di ghisa!, Wearing underpants made of cast iron!)

Sounds better

Japanese monks invented pious euphemisms so as not to taint the inner sanctum with jarring worldly words. Whipping came to be called nazu (caressing), tears shiotaru (dropping salt), money moku (eyes), testicles ryō gyaku (spiritual globes), and toilets kishisho (a place of truth).

Charismatic

However much some would prefer it if none of us believed in anything, it seems that holy men (and women) are here to stay:

- vusitavant (Pali, India) one who has reached perfection (in chaste living)
- mana (Polynesian dialect) the spiritual charisma attributed to holy people
- samādhi (Tamil) the abstract contemplation of an ascetic, in which the soul is considered to be independent of the senses; a sepulchre, grave
- nēsajjika-dhutanga (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) a religious observance which restrains a man from sleeping or lying down
- an-avakāṅkšamāna (Sanskrit) not wishing impatiently (said of ascetics who, having renounced all food, expect death without impatience)
- anupabbajjā (Pali, India) giving up worldly life in imitation of another

On reflection

Magic numbers

Certain groupings have particular significance, particularly in Southern Asia.
3 tam-cuong (Vietnamese) the three fundamental bonds – prince and minister, father and son, husband and wife

4 tu-linh (Vietnamese) the four supernatural creatures – dragon, unicorn, tortoise, phoenix

5 bani khoms (Yemeni) practitioners of the five despised trades (barber, butcher, bloodletter, bath attendant and tanner)

6 luc-nghe (Vietnamese) the six arts – propriety, music, archery, charioteering, writing and mathematics

7 saptavidha-ratnaya (Sinhala, Sri Lanka) the seven gems or treasures of a Chakrawarti king – chariot wheel, wife, jewel, elephant, horse, son, prime minister

8 ashtāng (Hindi) prostration in salutation or adoration, so as to touch the ground with the eight principal parts of the body, i.e. with the knees, hands, feet, breasts, eyes, head, mouth and mind

9 nasāya-ratna (Sanskrit) the nine precious gems (pearl, ruby, topaz, diamond, emerald, lapis lazuli, coral, sapphire and garnet) which are supposed to be related to the nine planets

10 dasa-mūtraka (Sanskrit) the urine of ten (elephant, buffalo, camel, cow, goat, sheep, horse, donkey, man and woman)

Whistling in the wind

If your god isn’t interested you may just have to fall back on other means:

- itinatalagá (Tagalog, Philippines) to place oneself at the mercy of fate
- uhranout (Czech) to cast the evil eye on somebody, to bewitch someone
- bino (Gilbertese, Oceania) an incantation to get a woman back by turning a gourd very rapidly and allowing the wind to whistle into the opening
- naffata (Arabic) a woman who spits on the knots (in exercising a form of Arabian witchcraft in which women tie knots in a cord and spit upon them with an imprecation)

The crystal ball

You might think that the advice of spirits and gods would be enough to comfort and direct humankind, but not a bit of it. We are so desperate to know what the future holds for us that almost anything will do:

- fakane (Bugotu, Solomon Islands) to divine, using a broken coconut shell
- koffiedik kijken (Dutch) reading tea leaves, predicting the future (literally, coffee-grounds-looking)
- ber-dreymr (Old Icelandic) having clear dreams as to the future
- lowa (Setswana, Botswana) a particular pattern in which a diviner’s bones have fallen
-onnevalamine (Estonian) telling one’s fortune by pouring molten lead into cold water (on New Year’s Eve)
- chichiri-wiirik (Buli, Ghana) a man who can call on fairies to reveal things to him; a type of diviner
- vayasa mutírtsu (Telugu, India) a crow crossing from the left side to the right (which Hindus consider a good omen)

Fringed with noodles

We all hope things will turn out well but there are all kinds of superstitions that wishing each other good luck might bring its reverse. When someone in Norway goes fishing, he is wished skitt fiske, lousy fishing.

German has two expressions for being lucky: Schwein haben, to have a pig – as a pig symbolizes good luck and lots of sausages; and Sott haben, to have soot – because, according to folklore, touching a chimney sweep brings luck. The French describe someone who is incredibly lucky as il a le cul bordé de nouilles, literally, his arse is fringed with noodles.

IDIOMS OF THE WORLD

When pigs fly

- na kukovo ljato (Bulgarian) in a cuckoo summer
- kad na vrbi rodi grožđe (Croatian) when willows bear grapes
- nár der er to torsdage i en uge (Danish) when a week has two Thursdays
- quand les poules auront des dents (French) when hens have teeth
- am Sankt Nimmerleinstag (German) on St Never-ever-day
- majd ha piros hó esik (Hungarian) when it’s snowing red snowflakes
- quando Pasqua viene a maggio (Italian) when Easter falls in May
- tuyaning dumi yerga tekkanda (Uzbek) when the camel’s tail reaches the ground
- când o fi bunica fată mare (Romanian) when my grandma will be a virgin again
- kag-da rak svist-nyet (Russian) when the crayfish whistles

- balik ağaca / kavağa çikinca (Turkish) when fish climb trees/poplar trees
- cuando las ranas críen pelos (Spanish) when frogs grow hair
The Wonder of Whiffling

CLATTERFARTS
AND JAISIES

Getting acquainted

Great talkers should be crop’d, for they have no need of ears

(Franklin: Poor Richard’s Almanack 1738)

Once upon a time, your first contact with someone was likely to be face to face. These days you’re as likely to get together via the computer:

- Floodgaters people who send you email inquiries and, after receiving any kind of response, begin swamping you with multiple messages of little or no interest
- Digerati those who have, or claim to have, expertise in computers or the Internet
- Disemvowel to remove the vowels from a word in an email, text message, etc, to abbreviate it
- Bitslag all the useless rubble one must plough through on the Net to get to the rich information ore
- Ham legitimate email messages (as opposed to spam)

DOG AND BONE

Possibly the most used English word of greeting – hello – only came into common usage with the arrival of the telephone. Its inventor, Alexander Graham Bell, felt that the usual Victorian greeting of ‘How do you do?’ was too long and old-fashioned for his new device. He suggested the sailor’s cry ahoy! as the best way to answer his machine and operators at the first exchange did just that. But ahoy! didn’t prove popular because it felt too abrupt. Compromise was soon reached with hello!, a word that came straight from the hunting-field. But could Bell ever have foreseen some of the ways in which his device would come to be used?

- Hollywood no (US slang 1992) a lack of response (to a proposal, phone call, message etc.)
- Scotchie (South African slang) a ‘missed call’ which communicates some pre-arranged message or requires the receiver to call back at their expense, thereby saving the first caller the cost of the call
- Fox hole (UK slang 2007) the area beneath one’s desk (in these days of open-plan offices) where telephone calls can take place peacefully
SNAIL MAIL

Of course, the old-fashioned letter still has its uses, as these Service slang words indicate: the key one being, in these days of retentive hard drives, that once you’ve destroyed your message, it leaves no trace:

- yam yum a love letter
- giz to read a pal’s letter to his girlfriend; to offer advice
- gander a look through the mail, a glance over another’s shoulder at a letter or paper
- flimsies the rice paper on which important messages are written and which can be eaten without discomfort in case of capture

VISITING HOURS

Or you can do that wonderfully traditional thing and pay a call in person:

- pasteboard (1864) to leave one’s visiting card at someone’s residence
- cohestation (17C) honouring with one’s company
- gin pennant (Royal Navy slang) a green and white triangular pennant flown to indicate an invitation on board for drinks

GR8

The arrival of mobile phones on the scene led immediately to some interesting usages. In the first wave of texting came shortened versions of much-used phrases:

- F2T free to talk
- AFAIK as far as I know
- T+ think positive
- BCNU be seeing you
- HAND have a nice day
- KIT keep in touch
- CUL8R see you later
- ZZZ tired, bored

When people switched to predictive text, they discovered the phenomenon of the phone’s software coming up with the wrong word; most famously book for cool (so teenagers started describing their hipper friends as ‘book’). Other textonyms include:

- lips for kiss
• shag for rich
• carnage for barmaid
• poisoned for Smirnoff

A LITTLE SOMETHING

A gift, however small, will always go down well:

- toecover (1948) an inexpensive and useless present
- xenium (Latin 1706) a gift given to a guest
- exennium (Old English law) a gift given at New Year
- groundbait (Royal Navy slang) a box of chocolates or something similar given to a lady friend in pursuit of a greater prize

DIGNITY AND PRIDE

In the US, the knuckles touched together are called, variously, closed-fist high fives, knuckle buckles or fist jabs. Done horizontally, the gesture is called a pound; vertically it’s the dap (which some say is an acronym of ‘dignity and pride’). Other greetings, of course, involve words, but hopefully not misunderstandings:

- clymsassenach (Cheshire) a mangled Welsh phrase meaning ‘I don’t understand English’
- shaggledick (Australian slang) an affectionate greeting for someone who is familiar but whose name doesn’t come to mind
- take me with you (Tudor–Stuart) let me understand you clearly
- thuten (Middle English 1100–1500) to say ‘thou’ to a person, to become a close friend

ALL RIGHT, MATE?

You never get a second chance to make a first impression, so be aware of how you’re coming across:

- corduroy voice (US 1950s) a voice that continually fluctuates between high and low (from the up-and-down ridges in corduroy)
yomp (Cheshire) to shout with the mouth wide open snoach (1387) to speak through the nose psellism (1799) an indistinct pronunciation, such as produced by a lisp or by stammering

RABBIT, RABBIT

Though there are always those who just can’t help themselves:

macrology (1586) much talk with little to say clatterfart (1552) a babbler, chatterer chelp (Northern and Midlands 19C) to chatter or speak out of turn blatteroon (1645) a person who will not stop talking eitherer (Galway) a woman with too much to say air one's vocabulary (c.1820) to talk for the sake of talking

SMOOTH CUSTOMER

Chit-chat apart, good manners always go down well (however bogus they may be):

garbist (1640) one who is adept at engaging in polite behaviour jaisy (Midlands) a polite, effeminate man sahlifahly (Nottinghamshire) to make flattering speeches court holy water (1519) to say fair words without sincere intention; to flatter deipnosophist (1656) a skilful dinner conversationalist

PETER PIPER: TONGUE TWISTERS

There are tongue twisters in every language. These phrases are designed to be difficult to say and to get harder and harder as you say them faster. They’re not just for fun. Therapists and elocution teachers use them to tame speech impediments and iron out strong accents.

Repeat after me (being particularly careful with the last one) …

Sister Sue sells sea shells. She sells sea shells on shore. The shells she sells. Are sea shells she sees. Sure she sees shells she sells

You’ve known me to light a night light on a light night like tonight. There’s no need to light a night light on a light night like tonight, for a night light’s a slight light on tonight’s light night

I’m not the pheasant plucker. I’m the pheasant plucker’s son. I’m only plucking pheasants till the pheasant plucker comes

Some short words or phrases ‘become’ tongue-twisters when repeated, a number of times fast:

Thin Thing
French Friend
Red Leather, Yellow Leather
Unique New York
Sometimes Sunshine
Irish Wristwatch
Big Whip
CLEVER CLOGS

But let’s not go too far. Nothing, surely is worse than those people who put on airs and graces …

nosism (1829) the use of the royal ‘we’ in speaking of oneself peel eggs (c.1860) to stand on ceremony gedge (Scotland 1733) to talk idly with stupid gravity godwottery (1939) the affected use of archaic language

… or claim to know more than they do:

ultracrepidarian (1819) one who makes pronouncements on topics beyond his knowledge raw-gabbit (Scotland 1911) speaking confidently on a subject of which one is ignorant to talk like the back of a cigarette card (UK slang 1930s) to pretend to greater knowledge than one has (the cards carried a picture on the front and a description or potted biography on the back)

MANNER OF SPEAKING

All’s fair in love and war, but a good classical education provides a conversational armoury that is hard to match:

diasyrm (1678) a rhetorical device of damning with faint praise sermocation (1753) a speaker who quickly answers his own question paraleipsis (Ancient Greek 1586) mentioning something by saying you won’t mention it eutrapely (1596) pleasantness in conversation (one of the seven virtues enumerated by Aristotle)

IRONY IN THE SOUL

Other tricks can leave the Average Joe standing …

charientism (1589) an insult so gracefully veiled as to seem unintended asteism (1589) polite and ingenuous mockery to talk packthread (b.1811) to use indecent language well hidden, as a tinker carefully folds and tucks thread back away into his pack of goods vilipend (1529) verbally to belittle someone

… and make the rest of us look like idiots:

onomatomania (1895) vexation in having difficulty in finding the right word palilalia (1908) a speech disorder characterized by the repetition of words, phrases or sentences verbigeration (1886) the repetition of the same word or phrase in a meaningless fashion (as a symptom of mental disease)

WORD JOURNEYS

Originally these common words and phrases meant something very different:

constipate (16C from Latin) to crowd together into a narrow room anthology (17C from Ancient Greek) a collection of flowers round robin (17C) a petition of protest whose signatures were originally arranged in a circle so that no name headed the list and no one person seemed to be the author (the robin does not refer to the bird but to the French rond for round and ruban for ribbon)
costume (18C) manners and customs belonging to a particular time and place
STICKYBEAK

Character

Let him that would be happy for a day, go to the barber; for a week, marry a wife;
for a month, buy him a new horse; for a year, build him a new house; for all his life time, be an honest man

(1662)

According to legal statute an idiot is an individual with an IQ of less than 20, an imbecile between 21 and 49 and a moron between 50 and 70. As you cast around for insults it may be worth remembering these categories. But then again, the English language has never been short of slurs for the stupid. Historically, you could have been a clumperton (mid 16C), a dull-pickle or a fopdoodle (both 17C); and more recently, two ants short of a picnic, two wafers short of a communion or even a few vouchers short of a pop-up toaster.

Over the centuries, some other fine reproaches have included:

- doddypoll (1401) a hornless cow, hence a fool
- jobbernowl (1599) a blockhead
- stubberdegullion (1616) a dirty, wretched slob
- goostrumnoodle (Cornwall 1871) a stupid person, a fool

LOOSE KANGAROOS

Australians, in particular, specialize in scorn for the intellectually challenged. In the 1950s you could have been as mad (or silly) as a cut snake, a hatful of worms or a Woolworth’s watch. More recently, in the 1980s, you might have been a couple of tinnies short of a slab or a few snags short of a barbie (where a tinnie is a beer can, a slab is a stack of cans and a snag is a sausage). Then again, a real idiot or drongo couldn’t blow the froth off a glass of beer, knock the skin off a rice-pudding, pick a seat at the pictures, find a grand piano in a one-roomed house, or tell the time if the town-hall clock fell on them. Other memorable expressions of Antipodean scorn include there’s a kangaroo loose in the top paddock and the wheel is turning, but the hamster is dead.
MEN OF STRAW

Fools can often be enthusiastic in their idiocy. Arguably more irritating are those whose marbles are all present, but who somehow just lack the drive:

- darlledumdue (Norfolk 1893) a person without energy
- maulifuff (Scotland) a young woman who makes a lot of fuss but accomplishes very little
- gongoozler (1904) an idle person who stands staring for prolonged periods at anything unusual
- mulligrubs (1599) a state of depression of spirits
- acciđie (Old French c.1230) spiritual torpor, world weariness

WHAT NOW?

Other types it’s as well to steer clear of include the mean …

- ehinchin (Middle English 1100–1500) to be stingy
- stiff (hotel trade jargon) any customer that fails to leave a tip the moaning …

- erusty-gripes (1887) a grumbler
- ehoowow (Fife) to grumble, a grudge
- forplaint (1423) tired by complaining so much the nosey …

- quidnunc (1709) a person who always wants to know what is going on (from Latin: ‘what now’)
- stickybeak (New Zealand 1937) an inquisitive person; also the nose of a nosy-parker
- pysmatic (1652) interrogatory, always asking questions or inquiring the elusive …

- didapper (1612) someone who disappears and then pops up again
- whiffler (1659) one who uses shifts and evasions in argument
- kinshens (Scotland 1870) an evasive answer: ‘I don’t know, I cannot tell’
- salt one up (US slang) to tell a different lie when covering up something
- salvo (1659) a false excuse; an expedient to save a reputation or soothe hurt feelings the unattractive …

- farouche (Horace Walpole 1765) sullen, shy and repellent in manner
- yahoo (Swift: Gulliver’s Travels 1726) a crude or brutish person
- ramstamphish (Scotland 1821) rough, blunt, unceremonious; forward and noisy the tedious …

- meh (US slang popularized by The Simpsons) boring, apathetic or unimpressive
- whennie (UK current slang) a person who bores listeners with tales of past exploits and the just plain impossible …

quisquous (Scotland 1720) hard to handle, ticklish utzy (LA slang 1989) uncomfortable, bothered, uneasy argol-bargolous (1822) quarrelsome, contentious about trifles eamstroudgeous (Fife) wild, unmanageable, obstinate, perverse whiffling (1613) trifling, pettifogging, fiddling

TWO GENTLEMEN

In the early nineteenth century two gentlemen in particular were to be avoided. Though both types persist, social developments may mean we see more of the second than the first these days. A gentleman of three ins was ‘in gaol, indicted, and in danger of being hanged in chains’. While a gentleman of three outs was ‘without money, without wit, and without manners’.

HIGH HAT

Foppish, conceited behaviour – once known as coxcombical (1716) – seems too to be a persistently male trait:

jackanapes (Northern 1839) a conceited, affected, puppyish young man princock (1540) a pert, forward, saucy boy; a conceited young man flapadosha (Yorkshire) an eccentric, showy person with superficial manners

WITCH’S BROOM

Women, by contrast, have come in for all kinds of criticism:

mackabroin (1546) a hideous old woman
Xanthippe (1596) an ill-tempered woman, a shrew (after Socrates’s wife) eantax (Westmoreland) a silly, giddy woman ermagant (1659) a violent, brawling, quarrelsome woman bungo-bessy (Jamaican 1940) a woman whose busybody qualities are considered highly undesirable eriss-miss (West Indian 1950s) a pretentious woman who overestimates her abilities, charms and allure

YUPPIES

Everyone’s so used to the word yuppie now that they forget that only twenty-five years ago it was a brand new acronym for Young Urban Professional. Here are some other acronyms coined subsequently to that famous first:

• SPURMO a Straight, Proud, Unmarried Man Over 30
• SADFAB Single And Desperate For A Baby
• CORGI a Couple Of Really Ghastly Individuals
• SITCOM Single Income, Two Children, Oppressive Mortgage
• KIPPERS Kids In Parental Property Eroding Retirement Savings
• SKIERS Spending their Kids Inheritance (on travel, health and leisure activities)

SLYBOOTS

Better, perhaps, those who assume airs than those who seem straightforward but aren’t:
Janjansy (Cornwall 1888) a two-faced person
Accismus (Medieval Latin 1753) feigning a lack of interest in something while actually desiring it Mouth-honour (G. B. Shaw: Major Barbara 1907) civility without sincerity Mawworm (1850) a hypocrite with delusions of sanctity Podsnap (from the character in Dickens’ Our Mutual Friend 1864) a complacent, self-satisfied person who refuses to face unpleasant facts
Skilamalink (East London slang late 19C) secret, shady

REGULAR GUY

Such characters make one long for that remarkable thing: the straightforward, decent, or just thoroughly good person …

Rumblegumption (Burns: letter 1787) common sense
Pancreatic (1660) fully disciplined or exercised in mind, having a universal mastery of accomplishments
Towardliness (1569) a good disposition towards something, willingness, promise, aptness to learn Rhadamanthine (Thackeray: Paris Sketchbook 1840) strictly honest and just (Rhadamanthus, Zeus’s half-human son, was made a judge of the souls of the dead due to his inflexible integrity)

… this is someone we all want to spend time with, and stay loyal to …

Wine (Old English) a friend
Bully (Geordie) a brother, comrade
Bread-and-cheese friend (Sussex) a true friend as distinguished from a cupboard-lover (a personal attachment that appears to be motivated by love but stems from the hope of gain)

WORD JOURNEYS

Amnesty (16C from Ancient Greek) forgetfulness, oblivion
Nice (13C from Latin nescire: to be ignorant) foolish; then (14C) coy, shy; then (16C) fastidious, precise; then (18C) agreeable, delightful Obnoxious (16C from Latin) exposed to harm
Generous (16C from Latin via Old French) nobly born GOING POSTAL

Emotions

Be not too sad of thy sorrow, of thy joy be not too glad

(c.1450)

Throughout the world the British were once famed for their stiff upper lip; but is this sort of imperturbability really no more than a paper-thin façade for some extremely strong feelings beneath?

- mgsomeness (1440) loathing
- jump salty (US slang 1996) to become angry
- brain (Middle English 1100–1500) furious
- throw sarcasm (Jamaican English 1835) to relieve one’s emotions by speaking out about one’s dislike for or sense of grievance against another
- unbosom (1628) to disclose one’s personal thoughts or feelings

HOPPING MAD

It’s now generally agreed that it’s better to let it all out than keep it in:

- dudgeon (1597) a resentful anger (dudgeon was a wood used to make dagger hilts)
- mumpish (1721) sullenly angry; depressed in spirits
- wooden swearing (US slang b.1935) showing anger by acts of violence or roughness, as in knocking furniture about
- go postal (US slang 1986) to lose your temper, behave with irrational violence, especially as a result of workplace stress (from a postal worker who killed fourteen fellow employees and wounded six before shooting himself)

JESUS WEPT

Tears, too, are regarded as a good thing these days. But it doesn’t stop them sometimes making for a kankedort (Chaucer: Troylus 1374) an awkward situation:

- gowl (c.1300) to weep bitterly or threateningly
- skirllie-weenack (Banffshire) to cry with a shrill voice
- grizzle (1842) to fret, sulk; to cry in a whining or whimpering fashion
- sinsorg (Anglo-Saxon) perpetual grief
- bubble (Geordie) to weep
BRING ME SUNSHINE

Luckily sunshine eventually follows rain. Words describing happiness offer fascinating barometers into history. For instance, the Old English word for joy, dream, also describes music and ecstasy – an intriguing view into the mind-frame of our ancestors …

- froligozene (Tudor–Stuart) rejoice! be happy!
- fleshment (Shakespeare: King Lear 1605) excitement from a first success
- felicificability (1865) capacity for happiness
- macarism (mid 19C) taking pleasure in another’s joy
- naffick (1900) to rejoice with an extravagant and boisterous public celebration
- kef (1808) a state of voluptuous dreaminess, full of languid contentment (originally used to describe the effects of opium)

MAKE ‘EM LAUGH

We can’t all be a grinagog (1565), one who is always grinning. But the contrast is all the better when we do finally get to see the funny side:

- cachinnate (1824) to laugh loudly and immoderately
- winnick (Lincolnshire) to giggle and laugh alternatively
- snirtle (1785) to laugh in a quiet or restrained manner
- popjoy (1853) to amuse oneself
- goistering (Sussex) loud feminine laughter

HA HA BONK
Humour is often cruel. At the heart of slapstick is a series of jokes that amuse only those who set them up:

- Press ham (US college slang 1950s) to press a bare buttock against a window and shock passers-by
- Squelch-belch (Winchester College 1920) a paper bag of water dropped from an upper window onto people below
- To catch the owl (late 18C) to play a trick on an innocent countryman, who is decoyed into a barn under the pretext of catching an owl: when he enters, a bucket of water is poured on his head
- Tiddley-bumpin’ (Lincolnshire) tapping on a window pane with a button on a length of cotton secured to the frame by a pin (a device used by boys to annoy neighbours)
- Pigeon’s milk (1777) an imaginary article for which children are sent on a fool’s errand (traditionally on April 1st)
- Squashed tomatoes (1950s) a game that involves knocking on a door and then rushing away as the homeowner answers it (also known as knock down ginger (England and Canada), ding-dong ditch (US), chappy (Scotland), dolly knock (Ireland))

WORD JOURNEYS

- Jest (13C from Latin and French) a deed or exploit; then (15C) idle talk
- Engine (13C from Latin via Old French) contrivance, artifice; then (14C) genius
- Frantic (14C) insane
- Negotiate (16C from Latin) ill at ease; not at leisure
- To have a chip on one’s shoulder (US 19C) of a custom in which a boy who wanted to give vent to his feelings placed a chip of wood on his shoulder in order to challenge any boy who dared to knock it off
In the developed world these days, one of the greatest concerns is being overweight, whether you are an adult or a child. But the evidence of language is that not being thin is hardly a new thing. Nor are people’s reactions:

- fubsy (1780) being chubby and somewhat squat
- fodge (Banffshire) a big, fat, awkward person
- floffy (Cornwall 1846) plump; also soft and spongy
- pursy (Scotland) short-breathed and fat
- fustilug (1607) a fat sloppy woman
- five by five (North American black 1930s) a short fat man (i.e. his girth is the same as his height)

CHUBBY CHOPS

It’s not just the whole but the parts that get labelled. In the UK people talk about bingo wings for flabby upper arms, a muffin top to describe that unsightly roll of flesh above tight jeans, a buffalo hump for an area of fat in the upper back and cankles for ankles so thick that they have no distinction from the calf. Over the pond recent slang is just as critical:

- bat wings flabby undersides of the upper arms
- banana fold fat below the buttocks
- ehubb fat around the kneecaps
- hail damage cellulite (from its pitted similarity to the effects of hail)

MODEL FIGURES

So it must be reassuring to some that being skinny can also attract unfavourable notice (especially when combined with height):

- windlestraw (1818) a thin, lanky person
- straight up six o’clock girl (US black 1940s) a thin woman
- slingy (Yorkshire 1897) tall, gaunt and sinewy
- gammerstang (1570) a tall, awkward woman
- stridewallops (Yorkshire) a tall, long-legged girl
- flacket (Suffolk) a girl, tall and slender, who flounces about in loose hanging clothes

NAPOLEON COMPLEX

The awful truth is that from the playground onwards, people who don’t meet the average have always had to put up with mockery. Luckily, vertically challenged role models from Alexander the Great to Napoleon have often had the last laugh:
NIP AND TUCK

So in the short term what can you do to change things? Wear platform shoes. Go on a diet. Or consider having some ‘work’ done:

- pumping party (Miami slang 2003) illegal gatherings where plastic surgeons give back street injections of silicone, botox, etc.
- rhytidectomy (1931) the surgical removal of facial wrinkles
- roider (US slang 2005) someone who injects illegal steroids to enhance his body
- reveal party (US current slang) a party held to celebrate successful cosmetic treatment, especially cosmetic surgery or dentistry

MAKEOVER

Then again, you could just pop down to the salon and have a less final and painful sort of revamp:

- whiffle cut a very short haircut worn by US soldiers in the Second World War
- farmer’s haircut (US slang 1984) a short haircut that leaves a white strip of skin showing between the bottom of the hair and the tanned portion of the neck
- follow-me-lads (mid 19C) curls that hang over a woman’s shoulder
- krobylos (Ancient Greek 1850) a tuft of hair on top of one’s head
- acersecomic (1612) one whose hair has never been cut

FACE FUNGUS

Ever since William the Conqueror passed a law against beards, facial hair has gone in and out of fashion. After the return of the heroic soldiers from the Crimea in the 1850s, the hirsute look became wildly popular:

- dundrearies (1858) a pair of whiskers that, cut sideways from the chin, are grown as long as possible (named after the comic character Lord Dundreary in the popular Victorian play Our American Cousin; these excessive sidechops, popular with gentlemen perambulating the centre of the capital, were also known as Piccadilly Weepers)
- burke (c.1870) to dye one’s moustache
- bostruchizer (Oxford University c.1870) a small comb for curling the whiskers
THREADBARE

From five o’clock stubble to the pudding ring (Florida slang), a facial decoration made up of a moustache and a goatee, many men cherish their beards because it’s the only kind of hair they have left:

- pilgarlic (1529) a bald man (referring to a peeled head of garlic)
- skating rink (US current slang) a bald head
- egg-shell blonde (New Zealand 1949) a bald man

Better such terms as these than being fingered for having a brillo (UK playground slang), a merciless expression for the style of a middle-aged male who is attempting to fluff up every hair to disguise his ever-expanding pate.

SNIFFER

Air can do only so much to frame a face. You can’t escape the features you’ve been given, especially that one in the middle:

- simous (1634) having a very flat nose or with the end turned up
- proboscidiform (1837) having a nose like an elephant’s trunk
- macrosmatic (1890) having a supersensitive nose
- meldrop (c.1480) a drop of mucus at the end of the nose

A WORD IN YOUR SHELL-LIKE

Even the highest in the land have to learn to live with the particular shape of their auditory nerves:

- FA Cup (UK playground slang 1990s) a person with protruding ears
- leav-lug’t (Cumberland) having ears which hang down instead of standing erect
- sowl (Tudor–Stuart 1607) to pull by the ears

PEEPERS

Eyes are more than mere features, they are extraordinary organs we should do our very best to look after:

- saccade (French 1953) the rapid jump made by the eye as it shifts from one object to another
- canthus (Latin 1646) the angle between the eyelids at the corner of the eye
- eyes in two watches (Royal Navy slang) of someone whose eyes appear to be moving independently of each other as a result of drunkenness or tiredness or both especially if there’s only one of them …

- half-a-surprise (UK slang late 19C) a single black eye
- seven-sided animal (18C riddle) a person with only one eye (they have a right side and a left side, a foreshide and a backside, an outside, an inside and a blind side)

CAKE HOLE

The gabella (Latin 1598) is the gap between the eyebrows, and the philtrum (Latin 17C) the groove below the nose. But though the mouth below attracts such crude names as gob, gash and kisser, its features and actions are more delicately described:
wikins (Lincolnshire) the corners of the mouth fipple (Scottish and Northern) the lower lip fissilingual (b.1913) having a forked tongue bivver (Gloucestershire) to quiver one’s lips mimp (1786) to speak in a prissy manner usually with pursed lips

GNASHERS

An evocative Australian expression describes teeth like a row of condemned houses. In this state, the only cure is to have them out and replaced with graveyard chompers, a Down Under phrase for false teeth, intriguingly similar to the Service slang dead man’s effects. But dental problems persist from the earliest night-time cries onwards:

neg (Cornwall 1854) a baby’s tooth shoul (Shropshire) to shed the first teeth ker lips; metal mouth; tin grin (US campus slang 1970s) a wearer of braces gubbertushed (1621) having projecting teeth snag (Gloucestershire) a tooth standing alone

CHEEK BY JOWL

What face would be complete without all those interesting bits in between?

joblocks (Shropshire) fleshy, hanging cheeks bucculent (1656) fat-cheeked and wide-mouthed pogonion (1897) the most projecting part of the midline of the chin prognathous (1836) having a jaw which extends past the rest of one’s face

… not to mention other decorative surface additions:

push (Tudor–Stuart) a pimple turkey eggs (Lincolnshire) freckles echristened by the baker (late 18C) freckle-faced

BOTTLING IT
Having broad shoulders has generally been seen to be a good thing, both literally and metaphorically. Other shapes are for some reason considered less reliable:

- bible-backed (1857) round-shouldered, like one who is always poring over a book
- champagne shoulders (c.1860) sloping shoulders (from the likeness to the bottle’s shape)
- Coke-bottle shoulders (Royal Navy slang) shoulders possessed by those individuals who are unwilling to take responsibility in any matter (after its rounded shape)

SINISTER

Most of us are right-handed. Once again, it’s the odd ones out who get noticed, and not kindly. Left-handed people have been variously described as molly-dukered, corrie-fisted and skerry-handit (Scotland); car-handed, cack-handed and cowie-handed (North East); kay-fisted, kibbo, key-pawed and caggy-ont (Lancashire); cuddy-wifter (Northumbria); kay-neeaved or dolly-posh (Yorkshire); keggy (East Midlands) and Marlborough-handed (Wiltshire); while awk (1440) is an old English word which means ‘with or from the left hand’ and thus the wrong way, backhanded, perverse or clumsy (hence awkward).

PAWS

But all hands are carefully observed, both for how they are and for what they’re doing:

- pugil (1576) what is carried between the thumb and two first fingers
- yepsen (14C) as much as the cupped hands will hold
- gowpins (Yorkshire) the two hands full when held together
- quobbled (Wiltshire) of a woman’s hands: shrivelled and wrinkled from being too long in the washtub
- elumpst (1388) of hands stiff with cold (hence clumsy)
- rope-hooky (UK nautical jargon late 19C) with fingers curled in (from years of handling ropes)

… right down to the detail of specific digits:

- lik-pot (Middle English 1100–1500) the forefinger of the right hand
- mercurial finger (Tudor–Stuart) the little finger (as in palmistry it was assigned to Mercury)
- flesh-spades (Fielding: Tom Jones 1749) fingernails
- gifts (UK slang b.1811) small white specks under the fingernails, said to portend gifts or presents
- kip (1548) to snap one’s fingers
- fillip (1543) a jerk of the finger let go from the thumb
- wig (Somerset) to rub a finger quickly and gently forwards and backwards

JOHN THOMAS

Further down are those parts often described as ‘private’, but subject also to any number of other euphemisms and nicknames:

- widdle-diddles (b.1811) testicles
- melvin (US slang 1991) to grab by the testicles
- he docked smack smooth (mid 18C) to have had one’s penis amputated
- merkin (1617) counterfeit hair for women’s private parts
- kinchinharfer (late 19C) a grumpy woman (i.e. ‘inch-and-a-halfer’ referring to the length of the disgruntled woman’s husband’s penis)

BUNS
The Ancient Greek-derived word callipygian (1646) has long been used to describe shapely buttocks, while in US slang badonkadonk indicates a bottom of exceptional quality and bounce. Unfortunately, rather more ubiquitous are displays of a less appealing kind:

working man’s smile (US slang) a builders’ bottom

LEGS ELEVEN

Below that, it’s good to have shapely stumps and elegant plates of meat, whatever the individual components look like:

- prayerbones (1900s) the knees
- baker’s knee (1784) a knee bent inwards (from carrying a heavy bread-basket on the right arm)
- Sciapodous (1798) having feet large enough to be used as a sunshade to shelter the whole body
- hallux (1831) a big toe

NOISES OFF

Cock-throppled (1617) describes one of those people whose Adam’s apple is largely developed; noop (1818) is Scottish dialect for the sharp point of the elbow; and both axilla (1616) and oxter (1597) are names for the armpit. But perhaps the oddest words of all are those describing the noises that bodies can make:

- yask (Shropshire) the sound made by a violent effort to get rid of something in the throat
- plapper (Banffshire) to make a soft noise with the lips
- borborygmus (1719) the rumbling, gurgling, growling sounds made by the stomach

WORD JOURNEYS

- handsome (1435) easy to handle; then (1577) convenient; then (Samuel Johnson 1755) beautiful, with dignity
- fathom (Old English) the span of one’s outstretched arms
- shampoo (18C from Hindi) to massage the limbs
- complexion (from Latin) woven together; then (14C) the bodily constitution, the combination of the four humours
- cold shoulder (from Medieval French) relating to a chateau guest who was served a cold shoulder of beef or mutton instead of hot meat, as a not-so gentle hint that he had overstayed his welcome
PRICK-ME-DAINTY

Under greasie clothes, are oft found rare virtues

(1666)

Even if you’re not, as the Australians say, as flash as a rat with a gold tooth, you can still make time to be well turned out:

- prick-me-dainty (1529) one that is finicky about dress; a dandy (of either sex)
- pavisand (Kipling: Simple Simon 1910) to flaunt opulent or expensive clothing or jewels in a peacock-like fashion
- flamfiew (1580) a gaudily dressed female, whose chief pleasure consists of dress
- sashmaree (Yorkshire) an elderly female conspicuous for the quaintness of her finery

UNMENTIONABLES

Not that all clothes are inherently smart:

- cover-slut (1639) a clean apron over a dirty dress
- orphan collar (US b.1902) a collar unsuitable to the shirt with which it is worn
- stilt (Lincolnshire) to pull down and re-knit the feet of worn stockings or socks if the legs are still good
- coax (UK slang mid 18C) to hide a dirty or torn part of one’s stocking in one’s shoes
- apple-catchers (Herefordshire) outsized knickers (as one could use them for harvesting apples)

![Image of a child wearing a dress]

SKIMPIES

Garments that leave less to the imagination often attract greater interest:

- banana hammock (US slang) a very brief men’s swimsuit
- pasties (strip club jargon 1961) coverings worn over the nipples of a showgirl’s or topless dancer’s breasts (to comply with legal requirements for entertainers)
- budgie smugglers (Australian slang) tight-fitting swimming trunks
TREWS

But even slinging on a pair of trousers may not stop the ogling:

- like Edgware Road (UK slang 20C) a phrase describing tight trousers (because it’s got no ballroom either)
- continuations (1825) trousers (since they continued a Victorian male’s waistcoat in a direction too delicate to mention)
- galligaskins (1577) loose breeches
- spatterdashes (1687) coverings for the legs by which the wet is kept off (especially in riding)
- gravity-bags (Westmorland) the seat of the trousers
- yorks (Wales) the practice of tying colliers’ and other workmen’s trousers above the ankles to prevent dirt and dust from reaching the upper parts of the body

GYM SHOES

Here at home we mainly call them trainers these days. But around the country and the English-speaking world the slang varies widely. In Newcastle they’re known as sandshoes; in Liverpool gollies; in Bristol and into Wales daps; in Nottingham pumps; in London plimsolls; and in Dublin whiteslippers. Other types of footwear vary widely:

- ferryboat (US 20C) a large, clumsy shoe
- eod-heads (Glasgow 1930s) shoes that have worn out at the toe
- done-promote (Jamaican English 1943) sandals made from worn out car tyres (i.e. one has been promoted from bare feet)
- excruciators (19C) very tight, pointed shoes (forerunners of the 20C winklepickers)

KITTED OUT

Some occupations leave little choice as to what you wear:

- lightning conductors (Royal Navy jargon) gold stripes running down the trouser seams of a Captain’s or Flag Officer’s Mess Dress uniform
- devil’s claw (c.1850) the broad arrow on convicts’ uniform
- fruit salad (Service slang) a large collection of medal ribbons which runs to three or more rows

SUITS YOU

There are all kinds of useful names for specific parts of clothing. Imagine how much easier life could be if you could define which pocket your keys are kept in or why exactly you have to turn down that fourth helping of turkey …
gerve (US late 19C) the breast-pocket in a jacket britch (US late 19C) the inside jacket pocket oppish (Glamorgan) the part of the trousers that have buttons in front slave (US military slang) the part of a garment covering an arm only yule-hole (Scots b.1911) the last hole to which a man could stretch his belt at a Christmas feast

REBELS IN BOATERS

Boys at Winchester College developed a rich lingo to describe how they wore their uniform. You could sport …

- a fringe (1920) to allow the bottom of one’s gown to become tattered
- an advertisement (1892) to turn down the collar of a College gown to show the velvet
- an angle (1920) to wear your straw hat crooked

Or more precisely:

- a halo (1920) to have your hat tilted like a halo so that the hair was showing in front

PERUKE

Looking round at all the shaven heads and brillos of today, perhaps men should consider a return to something that was once an essential accessory, even if the language used to describe it was somewhat less than heroic:

- cauliflower (1753) a large white wig, such as is worn by the dignified clergy and formerly by physicians
- dildo (1688) a cylindrical or ‘sausage’ curl on a wig
- eaxon (1756) a worn-out wig
- Nazarene foretop (1785) the foretop of a wig made in imitation of Christ’s head of hair, as represented by the painters and sculptors

TOPPING

Or else, fly in the face of contemporary fashion and sport some other headgear:

- hripipe (1737) the long tail of a graduate’s hood
- eow’s breakfast (Canadian slang) a large straw hat
- gibus (1848) an opera or crush hat
- havelock (1861) a cloth hanging from the back of a soldier’s cap to protect his neck from the sun
- biggin (1530) a tight-fitting cap tied under the chin, usually worn by children or as a nightcap by men
- goodgodster (Winchester College 1920) a brown bowler hat (from the exclamation necessarily uttered by anyone seeing so strange a thing)

WORD JOURNEYS

corset (14C from Latin and Old French) a little body mitten (14C from Old French) divided in the middle garter (14C from Old French) the bend in the knee tuxedo (from Amerindian) a wolf; then the name of a lake near New York whose residents in 1886 became so socially important that its name was given to a new style of dinner coats
GOING WEST
Illness, death and spiritual matters

Sicknesse doth wound or afflict the flesh, but it cures the soule

(1624)

The idealized body is all very well to look at, in a painting or beautiful photograph. But in life, of course, bodies are constantly working organisms, managing repetitive functions that we often try and pretend are not actually happening to us. Just look at the string of euphemisms for our regular trips to the loo or restroom. We go and check the price of wheat in Chicago (Fife), see the vicar and book a seat for evensong (Isle of Wight), shake the dew from one’s orchid (Cumbria) or wring out one’s socks (Kent).

WIND AND WATER

Related functions can cause us huge embarrassment, as we attempt to ignore the fact that air needs to be released or that sometimes the body will reject what we try and put into it:

- fluff (Yorkshire) to break wind silently
- dumb insolence (1916) breaking wind on parade
- thorough cough (b.1811) coughing and breaking wind backwards at the same time
- bespawl (Tudor–Stuart) to bespatter with saliva
- vurp (UK teen talk) a belching action that’s somewhere between vomiting and burping
- bake it (late 19C) to refrain from visiting the loo when one should go there

ELF WARNING

Nor, sadly, can we rely on the body always to be in tip-top condition:

- phthisickin (Essex) a slight, tickling cough
- waff (1808) just the slightest touch of illness (especially of a cold)
- aelfsogooa (Anglo-Saxon) a hiccough, thought to have been caused by elves
- blepharospasm (1872) uncontrollable winking galea (1854) a headache which covers the entire head like a helmet mubble-fubbles (1589) a fit of depression
- sirkenton (Ayrshire) one who is very careful to avoid pain or cold and keeps near the fire

MENS SANA

Though sometimes malfunction of the body has more to do with the mind that controls it …

- formication (1707) the sensation of bugs crawling over one’s body
- trichotillomania (1889) the compulsive desire to pull out one’s hair
- boanthropy (1864) the belief that one is an ox
- uranomania (1890) the delusion that one is of Heavenly descent calenture (1593) a distemper peculiar to sailors in hot climates, where they imagine the sea to be green fields, and will throw themselves into it

DOCTOR IN THE HOUSE

Calling in professional assistance is sure to be a good plan, even if the treatment prescribed may sometimes seem a bit unusual:

- urtication (1837) the act of whipping a palsied or benumbed limb with nettles to restore its feeling
- bezoar (1580) a stone from a goat’s stomach considered a universal antidote to poisons
- organ recital (medical jargon) a detailing of one’s medical history (especially of a hypochondriac’s)
- emporiatrics (medical terminology) the science of travellers’ health (jet lag, exotic infections, overexposure to hot or cold, altitude sickness etc.)

GOD KNOWS

Irreverent medical acronyms are used by some doctors on patients’ charts:

- UBI Unexplained Beer Injury
- PAFO Pissed And Fell Over
- GORK God Only Really Knows (a hospital patient who is, and may well remain, comatose)
- TEETH Tried Everything Else, Try Homeopathy
- GPO Good for Parts Only

It has been known that certain medics use the letters O and Q to describe their very oldest patients, with respectively, their mouths open, and their tongues out.

PULLING THROUGH

The sad fact remains that in the lottery of illness, some are fortunate …

- umbersorrow (Scotland) hardy, resisting disease or the effects of severe weather
- lysis (1877) the gradual reduction of the symptoms of a disease
- to cheat the worms (b.1887) to recover from a serious illness
- creaking gate (1854) an invalid who outlives an apparently healthier person (as a creaking gate hangs longest on the hinges)
… while others are less so (whatever their visitors think):

- goodly-badly (Cumberland) of a sick person whose looks belie their illness
- floccillation (1842) the action of a feverish patient in picking at the bedclothes during delirium
- churchyard cough (1693) a cough that is likely to terminate in death
- circling the drain (hospital jargon) a patient near death who refuses to give up the ghost
- wag-at-the-wall (Jamaican English) a ghost that haunts the kitchen and moves backwards and forwards before the death of one of the family

LAST WORDS

Your time has come, and this is a journey with no return ticket:

- thanatopsis (1816) the contemplation of death
- viaticum (Latin 1562) Holy Communion given to a dying person
- thatch (Scotland 1806) to gasp convulsively in the death-agony
- dormition (1483) a peaceful and painless death

THE GOLDEN STAIRCASE

This final action of the body is also something that people prefer not to refer to directly, as the following euphemisms for dying attest:

- buy the farm (US slang early 1900s)
- climb the golden staircase (US slang late 1800s)
- coil up one’s ropes (British naval slang)
- stick one’s spoon in the wall (British slang 1800s)
- meet one’s Waterloo (Australian slang)
- go trumpet-cleaning (late 19C: the trumpeter being the angel Gabriel)
- chuck seven (late 19C: as a dice-cube has no 7)
- drop one’s leaf (c.1820)
- take the everlasting knock (1889)
- pass in one’s cheeks (b.1872)

DEATH BY HONEY

Not of course that illness is the only way to go:

- buddle (Somerset) to suffocate in mud
- burke (1829) to smother people in order to sell their bodies for dissection (after the notorious Edinburgh body-snatchers Burke and Hare)
- scaphism (b.1913) an old Persian method of executing criminals by covering them with honey and letting the sun and the insects finish the job

A HEARTY JOKE

When hanging was the ultimate penalty in this country, as it was for many centuries, a particular kind of gloating black humour went along with the licensed murder of wicked people:

- hemp cravat (late 18C) a hangman’s noose
- to cry cockles (b.1811) to be hanged (from the noise made whilst being strangled) artichoke (underworld slang 1834) a hanging (a ‘hearty choke’)
- horse’s nightcap (late 18C) the cap drawn over a criminal’s eyes at his hanging (also known as Paddington spectacles (early 19C) from the execution of malefactors at Tyburn in the above parish

keep an ironmonger’s shop by the side of a common (1780) to be hanged in chains sheriff’s picture frame
(UK slang b.1811) the gallows

dismal ditty (c.1690) a psalm sung by a criminal just before his death at the gallows

DUST TO DUST

However you meet your end, it’s off to church for one last time:

- ecopod (UK 1994) a coffin specially designed to be environmentally friendly
- shillibeer (1835) a hearse with seats for mourners wheelicruise (Orkney Isles) a churchyard
- boot hill (American West 19C) a graveyard (where the occupants died ‘with their boots on’ i.e. violently)
- parentate (1620) to celebrate one’s parents’ funerals

KNOCKING-ON

Not that death is necessarily the end of your consequence on earth:

- dustscawung (Anglo-Saxon) a visit to a grave (‘a viewing of dust’)
- carrion-crow man (Guyanese English) a man who canvasses business for an undertaker following a death
- umest (1400) the coverlet of a bed, often claimed by a priest at the death of a parishioner
- to add a stone to someone’s cairn (18C) to honour a person as much as possible after their death
- memorial diamond (US slang 2001) a diamond created from carbon extracted from the remains of a cremated body
- deodand (1523) an object that has been the direct cause of death of a human being (such as a boat from which a person has fallen and drowned) which was forfeited to the crown to be used as an offering to God

ELYSIAN FIELDS

The spirit has most definitely left the body, but to travel who knows where? Over the centuries there have been many different answers to this fascinating question:

- fiddlers’ green (1825) the place where sailors expect to go when they die: a place of fiddling, dancing, rum and tobacco
- psychopannychy (1545) the sleep of the soul between death and the day of judgment
- Lubberland (1598) a mythical paradise reserved for those who are lazy
GOD’S IN HIS HEAVEN

Back on earth, those left behind try and make sense of this alarming flight. Many find a visit to a church helpful in all kinds of ways …

- scaldabanco (1670) a preacher who delivers a fiery sermon
- straquist (1894) one who partakes of the wine as well as the bread at communion
- officers of the 52nd (b.1909) young men rigidly going to church on the 52 Sundays in a year

… though some motives are more suspect than others:

- thorough churchman (b.1811) a person who goes in at one door of a church, and out at the other without stopping
- autem-diver (17C) a pickpocket specializing in the robbery of church congregations

SPEAK OF THE DEVIL

God is known by few names: God, Allah, Jehovah. But his old adversary has any number of monikers: author of evil, black gentleman, fallen angel, old scratch, old split-foot and the noseless one. Just in the north-east of England he’s been Clootie, Awd Horney, Auld Nick and the Bad Man, while Yorkshire has had him as Dicky Devlin; Gloucestershire as Miffy and Suffolk as Jack-a-Dells.

THE UNCERTAIN FUTURE

Religion asks us to accept our fate, whatever that may be. For many that’s not good enough. They need more concrete assurance of the good or bad things to come:

- onychomancy (1652) fortune-telling using reflected light on oiled fingernails
- pessomancy (1727) divination by throwing pebbles
- belomancy (1646) divination using arrows marked with symbols or questions, guidance being sought by firing the arrows or drawing them at random from a bag or quiver
- planchette (French 1920s) a small, heart-shaped board on casters with a pencil attached; when participants in a séance touched it lightly the planchette allegedly wrote messages from the dead

WORD JOURNEYS

- juggernaut (17C) from Hindi jagannath: a title of the god Vishnu ‘lord of the world’. It was believed that devotees of Vishnu threw themselves beneath the wheels of a cart bearing his image in procession
- mortgage (14C from Old French) a death pledge, a promise to pay upon a person’s death
- bask (14C) to bathe in blood
- bless (Old English) to redden with blood; then to consecrate
An apple pie without the cheese is like the kiss without the squeeze

British food is often unfavourably compared with the cuisines of other nations. But why on earth should this be?

- dribble-beards (Scotland 1829) long strips of cabbage in broth
- dog and maggot (UK military forces) biscuits and cheese
- hussha-wagga (Worcestershire) inferior cheese
- druschoch (Ayrshire) any liquid food of a nauseating appearance

HORSE FODDER

Dr Johnson famously described oats as ‘a grain which is in England given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people’. Turnips on the other hand have long sustained people on both sides of the border. In the dialect of north-east England they have been known as bagies, naggies, narkies, nashers, snadgers, snaggers, snannies, snarters, tungies and yammies. In Scotland they’re called neeps, as in bashed neeps (mashed turnips) the traditional accompaniment to haggis.

KITCHEN CONFIDENTIAL

Pig-months (19C) are those months in the year which have an ‘r’ in their name: that is, all except the summer months of May, June, July or August, when it was traditionally considered unwise to eat pork (or shellfish). But however safe your ingredients, correct preparation is essential:

- spitchcock (1675) to prepare an eel for the table
- bonx (Essex) to beat up batter for pudding
- engastration (1814) the act of stuffing one bird into another (the result is called a turducken)
- sclench (Shropshire) to check water at its boiling point, by dashing cold water into it
- swinge (Newfoundland 1896) to burn the down off sea-birds after plucking the feathers

CAT’S PRAYERS

Fancy names abound for different types of food, whether they be barely edible, plain or thought of as a delicacy:

- Boston strawberries (US late 19C) baked beans
- call-dog (Jamaican English 1943) a fish too small for human consumption (so one calls the dog to eat it)
- first lady (US drugstore jargon 1930s) spare ribs (Eve was made from Adam’s rib)
- scuttle-mouth (1848) a small oyster in a very large shell
- pishpash (Anglo-Indian) a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it
- bobby-jub (Yorkshire) strawberries and cream dandyfunk (nautical jargon 1883) a ship’s biscuit, soaked in water, mixed with fat and molasses, and baked in a pan
spadger (Tudor–Stuart) a sparrow; something small and tasty (sparrows were an Elizabethan delicacy) armored cow (US army slang 1940s) canned milk honeymoon salad (US diner jargon) lettuce alone (i.e. ‘let us alone’)
Adam and Eve on a raft (US diner jargon) two fried eggs on a piece of toast

GIVE AND TAKE AND EAT IT – RHYMING SLANG

Some rhyming slang simply rhymes but the best stuff takes it further, with the meaning carried across:

- borrow and beg (late 19C) an egg (the term enjoyed a fresh lease of life during the Second World War food-rationing period)
- give and take (20C) cake (no cake can be eaten that has not been given)
- satin and silk (American Pacific Coast 20C) milk (suggestive of this liquid food’s smoothness)
- army and navy (early 20C) gravy (which was plentiful at meal times in both services)
- didn’t ought (late 19C) port (based on the replies of ladies who, when asked to ‘have another’, said that they ‘didn’t ought’)

PLUS ONE

Whatever you put on your table, you can be fairly sure that there’ll be someone around to hoover it up:

- smell-feast (1519) one who haunts good tables, a greedy sponger
- dosherer (1634) someone who feasts or lives upon the industry of others
- slapsauce (1573) a person who enjoys eating fine food, a glutton
- hodger (US slang) a guest who eats all of the host’s food and drinks all of the host’s drinks

STOP PINGLING

Perhaps the best you can hope for is reasonable table manners:

- dooadge (Yorkshire) to handle food in a messy way (often said of children)
- mimp (1861) to play with one’s food
pingle (Suffolk) to move food about on the plate for want of an appetite sword swallower (Australian slang) someone eating from his knife, especially among shearers yaffle (1788) to eat or drink especially noisily or greedily

… or at least guests who aren’t fussy eaters:

pica (1563) a strong and unnatural craving for unsuitable food (such as chalk), which occurs during pregnancy
omophagist (1884) a person who eats raw flesh pozzy-wallah (Tommies’ slang 1914–18) a man inordinately fond of jam

!Image

POST-PRANDIAL

And then, hunger sated, you have the opportunity to sit back, digest and relax. Just keep an eye on all your guests …

rizzle (1890) to enjoy a short period of absolute idleness after a meal nooningscaup (Yorkshire 18C) the labourer’s resting time after dinner
dando (19C) one who frequents hotels, eating-houses and other such places, satisfies his appetite and decamps without payment

WORD JOURNEYS

omelette (17C from French via Latin) a thin flat blade
pittance (13C from Latin via Old French) originally a pious request; then (14C) donations to monastic orders on a person’s death to be spent on food and wine to be served on the anniversary of the donor’s death; then (16C) these diminished to the extent of meaning a sparing allowance bulb (17C from Ancient Greek via Latin) an onion companion (18C from Latin) someone who eats bread with you CRAMBAZZLED

Drink

It’s all right to drink like a fish
– if you drink what a fish drinks

(1938)

After your meal, what could be better than a cup of tea. Just make sure you’ve remembered to warm the pot and observe all the other niceties:

- to drown the miller to put too much water into tea (the supply of water is so great that even the miller, who uses a water wheel, is drowned with it)
- stranger (Sussex) a single tea-leaf floating in a cup of tea
- laptea (US slang) a crowded tea party where guests sit in each other’s laps
- to smash the teapot (late 19C) to abandon one’s pledge of abstinence from alcohol (the symbolic rejection of tea as one’s sole liquid stimulant)

DOWN AT THE OLD BULL AND BUSH

In Britain the drinking of alcohol has always been, for better or worse, at the heart of the community. The Romans had tabernae (the origin of our word tavern), which turned into the Anglo-Saxon alehouses, where a brewer would put a green bush up on a pole when the ale was ready to drink:

- kiddleywink (1830) an unlicensed public house
- brendice (1673) a cup in which a person’s health is drunk
- spit chips (Australian slang 1901) to have extreme thirst (from the idea of having dry wood in your mouth)
- flairing (Sydney slang) the action of bartenders of balancing, catching, flipping, spinning or throwing bottles, glasses, napkins or straws with finesse and style

MINE’S A NIPPITATUM

The traditional pint comes in many forms:

- arms and legs (UK slang 19C) weak beer (i.e. a drink that has no body)
nippitatum (1576) exceptionally strong beer barbed wire (Australian slang, Darwin) Four X beer (from the xxxx symbol) parson’s collar (1940s) the froth on top of a glass of beer neckum, sinkum and swankum (Berkshire) the three draughts into which a jug of beer is divided

ON THE NAIL

Though for refined types more Continental beverages may be preferred, whatever their quality:

supernaculum (1592) the finest wine, which is so good it is drunk to the last drop, referring to the custom of turning over a drained glass and letting the last drop of wine fall onto the thumbnail (from the Latin ‘upon the nail’) butler’s perks (UK euphemism) opened but unfinished bottles of wine beeswing (1860) the scum found on the surface of aged wine balderdash (1611) adulterated wine

PEARLY GATES

The names of British pubs are not all that they seem – certainly if you’re looking at the picture on the sign hanging outside them. The Cat and Fiddle didn’t derive from a music-loving publican who kept cats, but is a corruption of Catherine le Fidèle, which refers to the faithfulness of Catherine of Aragon, Henry VIII’s first wife. The Hope and Anchor comes from the Biblical text ‘We have this as a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul, a hope’; The Cross Keys is the symbol of St Peter, the gatekeeper of heaven; and The Royal Oak commemorates the tree that hid Charles II from Oliver Cromwell’s forces after his defeat at Worcester.

LAST GASPER

In Tudor times drink actually meant to smoke tobacco, something you could once do inside the bar. Now the misocapnists (1839), those who hate the smell of smoke, are in charge, so that’s a pleasure restricted to the pavements outside:

smirting (US slang New York) flirting between people who are smoking cigarettes outside a pub, office etc.
vogueress (Polari slang) a female smoker asablanca (Tommys’ slang 1914–18) the last one, especially of cigarettes doofer (workmen’s slang b.1935) half a cigarette toss the squares (US black slang) to pass a packet of cigarettes whiffler (1617) a smoker of tobacco
JUST THE ONE

Take it or leave it, boozing is a serious business:

- eagg (UK military slang b.1811) a solemn vow or resolution used by private soldiers not to get drunk for a certain time
- parson palmer (late 18C) a term of reproach, to one who stops the decanter circulating by preaching over his liquor (as was done by a parson of that name whose cellar was under his pulpit)
- duffifie (Aberdeenshire) to lay a bottle on its side for some time, after its contents have been poured out, so that it may be completely drained of the remaining few drops

SPEAKEASY

Just make sure your companions understand the importance of paying their way:

- to raddle someone’s toe (Australian late 19C) to request someone to buy a round of drinks
- twizzling (Sussex) spinning a pointer on a pub ceiling to decide who should buy the next round
- decorate the mahogany (Hobo slang) to buy the drinks; to line the bar with thirsty throats and brimming glasses
- shot-clog (1599) an unwelcome drinking companion tolerated because he pays for the drinks

DRINK AND BE MERRY?

Soon, if you’re not exactly zig-zag – Tommies’ slang from the First World War for the state where it’s impossible to walk in a straight line – the booze will certainly be making itself felt:

- hozzy nozzy (Rutland) not quite drunk
- bleezed (Scotland 19C) the state of one on whom intoxicating liquor begins to operate: especially describing the change produced in one’s facial expression cherubimical (Benjamin Franklin 1737) benevolently drunk
- tenant in tail (mid 17C) one whose drunkenness promotes indiscriminate displays of affection
- whiffled (P. G. Wodehouse: Meet Mr Mulliner 1927) drunk

FROM SHEEP TO SOW

In Lincolnshire they marked out four distinct phases of intoxication. A man was sheep drunk when he was merry and easily handled; then lion drunk when he was brave and boastful; ape drunk when he got up to silly, irresponsible tricks; and finally sow drunk when he fell to the ground in an alcoholic stupor.

TWO TOO MANY

Sailors are legendary for their drinking prowess but watch out for these two:

- admiral of the narrow seas (early 17C) a drunkard who vomits over his neighbour
- vice admiral of the narrow seas (1811) a drunken man that pisses under the table into his companions’ shoes

THE MOURNING AFTER

Being drunk means never having to say you’re sorry, until the next morning of course when you forswear alcohol for tea again:

- take a sheep-bed (Wiltshire) to lie down like a sheep to sleep in a grass-field, till one is sober woofits (1918) a hangover; a vague unwell feeling; a headache; a moody depression gunfire (Service slang) early morning tea (because it often has to be of considerable strength to counteract a bad head) _to feel as if a cat had kitten’d in one’s mouth* (16C) to feel the nauseous after-effects of drinking erambazzled (Yorkshire) prematurely aged through drink and a dissolute life

WORD JOURNEYS

bonkers (early 20C) slightly tipsy

tobacconist (16C) a tobacco smoker grape (11C from Old French) a hook for gathering fruit; then a cluster of fruit growing together

stale (13C) old and strong (applied to wine and ale having stood long enough to clear of sediment)
FOOTER-FOOTER

_Taking off_

A traveller must have the backe of an asse to beare all, a tung like the taile of a dog to flatter all, the mouth of a hogge to eate what is set before him, the eare of a merchant to heare all and say nothing

(1594)

Going for a walk is the quintessential English form of relaxation; but there are many varieties within the basic idea of putting one foot in front of another …

- _mantle_ (Lincolnshire) to walk aimlessly up and down with short steps
- _starp_ (North East) to walk with long strides
- _footer-foofer_ (Scotland 1894) to walk in an affected mincing manner
- _suddle_ (Suffolk) to walk alone with the head held low
- _slochet_ (Bedfordshire 1809) to walk with shoes nearly falling off the feet
- _festination_ (1878) walking faster and faster involuntarily

… and sometimes it can all seem a bit too much:

- _pouff_ (Banffshire) the act of walking with a heavy step, especially through weariness
- _plout_ (North East) to struggle to walk
- _surbater_ (1633) someone who tires another person out by walking
- _box_ (Gloucestershire) to knock the feet together while walking
- _dot and go one_ (b.1811) to waddle: of people with one leg shorter than the other
- _darby-roll_ (19C) a style of walking that betrays an individual’s experience of fetters and thus time spent in prison

So why not take up that efficient, ecological and highly fashionable way of getting around – just be sure not to flirt with its dangers:

- _eroggie_ (UK school slang) a ride on the crossbar or handlebars of another rider’s bicycle
- _blackadder_ (West Scotland playground slang) the action of allowing a bike to continue its journey without a rider (usually performed at the top of hills on either old, borrowed or stolen bikes)
- _endo_ (US slang San Francisco 1987) a bicycling accident in which the rider is thrown over the handlebars
- _SMIDSY_ (cyclists’ acronym) Sorry Mate, I Didn’t See You
- _acrobrat_ (UK playground slang 1970s) a kid who attaches poles to the front axle of his bike so he can bounce up and down on the front wheel
Once upon a time more substantial vehicles moved slowly and with difficulty:

- unicorn (1785) a coach drawn by three horses, two abreast and one in the lead
- timwhisky (1764) a light carriage for one or two people, pulled by one or two horses
- quarter (Shropshire) to drive a cart in a lane with deep ruts, in such a way as to keep each wheel clear of them
- to hunt the squirrel (18C) for two coachmen to attempt to upset each other’s vehicles as they race along a public road (veering from side to side like a frightened squirrel)

Now the opposite is too often the case:

- garyboy (East Anglia slang 1995) a male who drives a car usually noticeable by its sporty appearance and souped up engine
- swoop and squat (US slang 2005) to pull in front of another vehicle and slam on the brakes, deliberately causing an accident to collect the insurance money
- shawbuckswar (Anglo-Indian) a rough rider

TICKET TO RIDE

Not that you need to have your own transport to get around:

- fly canaries (underworld slang 1945) to pass off used tram tickets as new ones
- monkey board (mid 19C) the step on the bus on which the conductor stands
- hong! and midor! (UK transport workers’ jargon) ‘hurry along’ and ‘mind the doors’
- Cinderella fare (US cabdrivers’ slang) people left behind on the platform when the last train leaves late at night

I SPY

Travelling piquet (1785–1840) was one way bored travellers amused themselves when riding together in a carriage. Scores were given for people and objects passing by on their side of the carriage, as follows:

- a man or woman walking = 1
- a horseman = 2
- a post chaise = 5
• a flock of geese = 10
• a flock of sheep = 20
• a man with a woman behind him = 30
• a man, woman and child, in a buggy = 40
• a cat looking out of a window = 60
• an old woman under a hedge = game won
• a parson riding a grey horse with blue tack = game won

GRICER’S DAUGHTER

Let’s not forget those who are happy just to watch. Trainspotters may be mocked by the outside world, but they don’t take criticism lying down: the language of gricing is notable for its acidic descriptions of outsiders.

• ber the majority of people on trains, only interested in getting from A to B
• insects occasional railway enthusiasts who swarm at certain times of year
• kettle basher someone obsessed with steam engines (looked on as an effete sentimentalist)
• baglet a woman, generally looked upon with unfriendliness. Gricers are invariably male. Worst of all women is The Baglet – Lady Thatcher, whose reluctance to travel by train was legendary and who set the privatization of British Rail in progress

ELSEWHERE

Hopefully you will arrive safely at your destination. Though some places, traditionally, have been more euphemistic than real. You could go to …

• Jericho (late 18C) to become drunk
• Bath (mid 17C) to take up life as a beggar
• Chicago (US late 19C) to run away, especially to avoid one’s debts
• Copenhagen (1950s) to have a sex operation
• the Bahamas (US slang) to be sent to solitary confinement
• Peckham (early 19C) to sit down to eat

WORD JOURNEYS

• muddle (17C) to wallow in mud
• walk (from German) to press cloth, knead or roll paste; then (Old English) to roll, toss, move about
• insult (16C from Latin) to leap upon; then (16C) to glory or triumph over
• random (15C) great speed, violence; then (17C) of a shot: haphazard, without purpose, fired at any range other than point blank
MUTTONERS AND GOLDEN FERRETS

Sport

Sport is sweetest when there be no lookers on

(1616)

Sport has always been a part of British national life. In the beginning were the informal games that anyone could play anywhere:

- way-zaltin (Somerset) a game in which two persons standing back to back interlace each other’s arms and by bending forward alternately raise each other from the ground
- hot cockles (1580) a rustic game in which one player lay face downwards, or knelt down with his eyes covered, and being struck by the others in turn, guessed who struck him
- kinch-pinich (1603) a game where one person hits another softly, then the other player hits back with a little more force, and each subsequent blow in turn is harder, until it becomes a real fight

IN TOUCH

Many of our best-known sports started life in similar fashion. The earliest games of football involved one village taking on another, in violent, day-long combats where broken legs and bruised heads were common. Current slang reveals that underneath, perhaps, little has changed:

- blaggudy (Wales) rough, dirty (especially of a football or rugby team)
- elagger (UK slang 1970) a soccer player who regularly injures other players
- sprig-stomping (New Zealand 1993) the deliberate stamping with studded boots on a recumbent rugby opponent
- falling leaf a long-range shot in football which sees the ball change direction radically in the course of its flight
- spaghetti-legs routine a goalkeeper’s trick employed to distract a penalty taker
SECONDS AWAY

Another of our oldest sports had similar rough-and-tumble beginnings:

- lown (Winchester 19C) a box on the ear
- glass jaw (US slang 1940) of a boxer with an inability to withstand a punch to the chin
- haymaker (1912) an unrestrained punch usually leading to a knockout, whereby the fist is swung wide in an arc
- claret christening (b.1923) the first blood that flows in a boxing match
- waterboy (US police slang 1930s) a boxer who can be bribed or coerced into losing for gambling purposes

FROM LAND’S END TO BROADWAY

Wrestling, too, has become less violent and more theatrical over the years, with a terminology that dates back to its origins, supplemented by more recent slang from around the world …

- falx (Tudor–Stuart) a grip round the small of the back
- Cornish hug a hug that causes one to be thrown over (Cornish men were famous wrestlers)
- sugarbagging the tossing of an opponent onto the canvas as if he were a bag of sugar
- whizzer an arm lock trapping one’s arm against the opponent’s body from a position behind him
- potato (US slang 1990) a real hit that injures, as opposed to an orchestrated, harmless one
- jobber a wrestler whose primary function is losing to better-known wrestlers
- broadway a drawn result (so-called because, ideally, the result makes both men bigger stars)

OVER AND OUT

Another quintessentially English game has a host of extraordinary terms, from the yorker (a ball pitched directly at the batsman’s feet) to silly mid-off (a fielding position close to and in front of the batsman). Other words have fallen out of fashion:

- muttoner (Winchester College 1831) a blow from a cricket ball on the knuckles, the bat being at the time clasped by them
- slobber (1851) to fail to grasp the cricket ball cleanly in fielding
- bowl a gallon (Eton College c.1860) to get a hat-trick (the bowler then earned a gallon of beer)

TO THE 19TH

For the more senior sportsman, another gentler but equally demanding game with British (well Scottish, strictly) roots has been successfully exported around the world. First comes the teeing off, with all the problems that that entails:

- waggle pre-stroke trial movements
- sclaffing skidding the club over the grass before it hits the ball
- skull to hit the ball too far above its centre
- shank to hit the ball with the neck of the club
- whiff a stroke that misses the ball

then the slow or fast progression down the fairway:

- chilli-dip a weak, lofted shot that follows a mis-hit that has managed to hit more ground than ball (from the image of taking a taco and scooping up a helping of chilli)
- fried egg a ball lying embedded in sand
- golden ferret a golf stroke where the ball is holed from a bunker nulligan a free extra shot sometimes taken as a second chance in a social match to a player who has made a bad one, not counted on his score-card before the triumphant arrival at the green:

frog hair the well-cut grass that divides the fairway from the green itself and is of a length and smoothness somewhere between the two steamy a short shot or a putt that passes over or through the green stiff a shot that stops so close to the hole that it must be impossible to miss the putt

TOUCHÉ

Fencing, by contrast to all of the above, originated on the Continent and so has a language with a very European feel:

mandritta (Tudor–Stuart 1595) a cut from right to left

passado (Shakespeare: Love’s Labour’s Lost 1588) a motion forwards and a thrust volt (1692) to leap with both feet in the air by your opponent’s left shoulder appel a tap or stamp of the foot, serving as a warning of one’s intent to attack

derobement an evasion of the opponent’s attempt to take or beat the blade while keeping the sword arm straight and threatening the opponent

TOUR DE FRANCE

Since their invention in France in 1860, bicycles have been eagerly embraced by our Gallic neighbours. So it’s hardly surprising that cycling is a sport with French jargon:

musette a small cotton shoulder bag containing food that’s handed to riders during a race domestique a member of a professional cycling team, whose job is to ride solely for the benefit of the team and team leader, instead of their own glory

lanterne rouge the overall last-place rider in a stage race (from the red light found on the back of a train)

But as soon as things start going wrong, we’re back to good old English:

bonk a cyclist’s feeling of being devoid of energy sag wagon the vehicle that carries bicyclists that have withdrawn from the event (due to injury, bicycle malfunction, tiredness etc.)

HEY DUDE!

Surfers follow the waves; and though you can find something to ride on in Newquay, they’re altogether bigger, better and harder to stay on in Big Sur and Bondi …

shark biscuit (Australian slang c.1910) a novice surfer hang five (US 1960s) to ride with the toes of one foot hooked over the front of the board knots the bruises and cuts gained from battling the waves and his board (a surfer’s status mark)

grubbing falling off your board while surfing frube a surfer who does not catch a wave for the whole time they are in the water hodad (1962) a show-off who hangs around surfing beaches, boasting of his exploits and trying to pick up girls, who has rarely, if ever, tried to surf

eowabunga! (Australian slang 1954) a shout of elation on surfing down a superb wave
COLORADO CLIFFHANGER

Climbing terms, likewise, come from mountainous places:

- gingich (Scotland 1716) the chief climber or leader in climbing rocks
- flash (Canada 1995) to climb a wall successfully on the first try
- dynoing (Colorado 1992) leaping to a distant or out-of-reach hand hold
- hang-dogging (Colorado 1992) a derogatory term for inexperienced climbers who hang on the rope while attempting feats beyond their ability

TROLLING AND YUMPING

Every sport, indeed, has both specialized terminology and also the kind of insiders’ slang that makes seasoned practitioners feel quietly different, whether that be …

Rowing …

- gully-shooting (b.1891) pointing oars upwards when rowing
- gimp seat seat number 3 in an eight-person boat (often regarded as having the least responsibility)
- blip-o! (late 19C) a derisive cry at a boat’s coxswain colliding with anything

Tennis …

- ketchepillar (early 16C) a tennis player
- nacket (1833) a tennis ball-boy

Gymnastics …

- coffee grinder a manœuvre from a squatting position on the floor involving a circle of the leg while keeping both hands on the floor
- fliffis a twisting double somersault performed on the trampoline
- fly-away a horizontal-bar dismount method with a backward somersault

Billiards …

- feather to run the cue backwards and forwards across the bridge between finger and thumb prior to making a shot
- english the spin imparted to the ball
- cocked hat a shot in which the ball hit by the white rebounds off three different cushions towards a middle pocket or any of the other ways active people have found to pass their time, from long ago …

- cock-squailing an old Shrove Tuesday sport involving flinging sticks at a cock tied by the leg, one penny per throw and whoever kills him takes him away
- strag (Lancashire) to decoy other people’s pigeons
- trolling (Yorkshire) rolling hardboiled eggs down a slope (on Easter Monday)
- dwile flunking (Suffolk) floorcloth throwing (a serious, competitive game)
- postman’s knock (Oxfordshire) a method of sliding on ice (by moving on one foot and tapping the ice with the other) to right now …

- do an Ollie (skateboarding) to flip your ride in the air and stay aloft upon it
- yump (rally-driving) to leave the ground in one’s vehicle when going over a ridge
- sandbagging (motorcycle racing) a stratagem whereby the favourite lets the rest of the field go on ahead, confident that when necessary he can regain the lead and win the race as expected
- bulldogging (rodeo) to leap off a horse and then wrestle with a steer (the intention being to twist it by the horns and force it over onto the ground)
- zorbing (New Zealand) harnessing oneself inside a huge inflatable PVC ball, then rolling more than 650 feet downhill

WORD JOURNEYS

- upshot (16C) the final shot in archery that decided a match
- racket (16C from Arabic via French) the palm of the hand
- umpire (15C from Latin: non par, via Old French) not equal
- gymnasium (16C from Ancient Greek via Latin) a school for exercising in the nude
By long tradition in Britain, certain outdoor activities have been elevated to a higher category, that of ‘field sports’. The most controversial of these is currently banned by law, though what this ban actually amounts to is anyone’s guess:

- own the moment in a hunt when the hounds show that they have found a scent
- eut a voluntary to fall off one’s horse while hunting
- raner (c.1860) one who hesitates at a difficult jump
- tantivy (1641) at full gallop
- shoe-polisher a derisive term for a dog that doesn’t stray far from a hunter’s feet

Since 2004 deer can no longer be pursued with hounds in the UK, marking the end of a tradition dating back well before these terms from the Tudor–Stuart period:

- abatures the traces left by a stag in the underwood through which he has passed
- velvet-tip the down upon the first sprouting horns of a young deer
- rascal a lean deer not fit to hunt
- rechate the calling together of the hounds in hunting
- dowcets the testicles of a deer

You may however still stalk and shoot these animals, as you may game birds such as pheasant or grouse. Which is perhaps ironic when you consider how much more efficient an instrument a gun is than a pack of hounds. As the Victorian dramatist W. S. Gilbert put it, ‘Deer stalking would be a very fine sport if only the deer had guns’.

- collimate (1837) to close an eye to aim at a target
- slipshot (1568) in shooting: a miss in some way
- fire into the brown (1871) shooting into the midst of a covey instead of singling out one bird
- tailor (1889) to shoot at a bird, trying to miss
- air washed a bird that lands and doesn’t move or falls dead in the air and hits the ground (thus giving off very little scent on the ground and being difficult for dogs to find)
- making game of a dog when it finds fresh scent

BIRDING

A gentler approach to our feathered friends has its own special terminology. And as any birder will tell you, it’s simply not accurate to call them all twitchers:

- squeaking noisily kissing the back of your hand in order to attract hidden birds
- lifer a particular bird seen for the first time
- getting a tick seeing a bird you’ve not seen before
- gripping off seeing a bird when someone else doesn’t
- stringer a person suspected of lying about bird sightings
- slipping out missing seeing a bird
- whiffing of geese: descending rapidly from a height once the decision to land has been made, involving fast side-slipping first one way and then the other

GETTING HOOKED

Another ancient field sport remains highly unlikely to be banned (at least while Britain remains a democracy):

- broggle (1653) to fish, especially for eels, by thrusting a sharp stick with bait on it into holes in the river bed
- zulu (1898) an artificial fly
- fizgig (1565) a kind of dart or harpoon with which seamen strike fish
- guddle (1818) to catch trout by groping with the hands under the stones or banks of a stream
- angletwitch (c.940) a worm used as bait in fishing
- rubby-dubby (game fishing jargon) the minced fish (mackerel, pilchards etc.) used as a bait for larger fish especially sharks
- angishore (Newfoundland) a man too lazy to fish

ROYAL FLUSH

One pursuit of folk from country and town alike is known also as ‘the sport of kings’, a moniker that certainly remains appropriate with our current crop of royals:

- persuader (Australian slang) the jockey’s whip
- poppism (1653) the smacking sound with which riders encourage their horses
- call a cab the jockey’s action in waving one arm to hold his balance when he and the horse are taking a fence
- drummer a horse that throws about his fore legs irregularly morning glory a horse ‘catching pigeons’ (showing great promise on the training gallops) but unable to repeat the form on a racetrack

airedale (US slang 1960s) a worthless racehorse

post the blue (b.1909) to win the Derby

---

GIFT HORSES

With large sums of money involved, the temptation to tamper with the proper result is as old as racing itself:

injler (underworld slang 1797) a crooked horse breeder bishop to disguise the age of a horse by tinkering with its teeth

drop anchor fraudulently to cause a horse to run slowly in a race hook (New Zealand 1910) to ride a horse with the aim of losing

---

ODDS ON

Down by the track, there’s little that passes the bookies by:

pencil-fever (c.1872) the laying of odds against a horse certain to lose

springer (UK slang 1922) a horse on which the odds suddenly shorten

skinner (Australian slang 1891) a horse which wins at long odds (a betting coup for bookmakers who do not have to pay out on a heavily backed favourite)

stickout (US slang 1937) a racehorse that seems a certain winner

nap (bookies’ jargon) a racing tipster’s best bet of the day

scaler (New Zealand 1908) a bookmaker who decamps without paying out

They’ve even developed their own method of communication without words, known as tic-tac, where they signal with their arms to communicate complicated changes in the odds to outside bookmakers. To these professionals, there’s slang for any bet you care to make:

- macaroni odds of 20/1
- carpet odds of 3/1
- elef a vier odds of 11/4
- bottle odds of 2/1
- shoulder odds of 7/4
• ear’ole odds of 6/4
• up the arm odds of 11/8
• wrist odds of 5/4

VERY GOOD GOING

In the US and Australia (amongst other places) they have their own words for particular combinations of winners:

- exacta or perfecta a wager in which the first two finishers in a race, in exact order of finish, must be picked
- quinella a wager in which first two finishers must be picked, but payoff is made no matter which of the two wins and which runs second
- trifecta to pick three horses in a particular race to finish 1st, 2nd and 3rd (the payout is determined by the betting pool on the turnover of the particular bet)
- superfecta a bet that forecasts in correct order the first four horses in a given race

WORD JOURNEYS

- jockeys (16C) horse traders (once called Jocks: men of the people)
- allure (15C from Old French) to bait: a device in falconry used by hunters to call back their hawks
- relay (15C from Old French) to loose the hounds; a pack of fresh hounds held in reserve to relieve a previous pack
- croupier (18C from French) a pillion rider, a rider on the croup of a horse; then someone who stood behind a gambler and gave advice
MADHOUSE

Indoor games and hobbies

Cards and dice … the devil’s books and the devil’s bones

(1676)

There’s no shortage of enjoyable activities for those who would rather not brave our famously awful weather. Even the simplest-seeming have a complex terminology worth getting to know:

- murgatroyd: a badly manufactured tiddlywink, flat on both sides
- squopped: of a free tiddlywink that lands on another wink
- blitz: an attempt to pot all six winks of your own colour early in the game
- erud: a forceful shot whose purpose is to destroy a pile of winks completely
- lunch: to pot a squopped wink (usually belonging to an opponent)
- boondock: to send an opponent’s tiddlywink a long way away, preferably off the table

LOW ROLLERS

The number of nicknames for marbles indicates what a popular game this is too (and still so in the age of the Game Boy® and the computer). In the dialect of the north-east of England, for example, marbles have been known as alleys, boodies, glassies, liggies, marvels, muggles, penkers, parpers and scudders. That’s just the start of it:

- flirt (Yorkshire) to flick a marble with finger and thumb
- fullock (Shropshire) to shoot a marble in an irregular way by jerking the fist forward instead of hitting it off by the force of the thumb only
- deegle (Cheshire) a stolen marble
- neggy-lag (Yorkshire) the penultimate shot
- hawk (Newfoundland) to win all an opponent’s marbles
- smuggings! (UK teen slang mid 19C) mine! (the exclamation used at the end of a game of marbles or spinning tops when the child who shouted first was allowed to keep the toy in question)

DICEMAN

When you get a little older, it becomes more interesting to throw objects with a more challenging set of possibilities:

- snake eyes (North American slang 1929) getting double ones, the lowest score (supposedly resembling a snake’s stare)
- box cars (underworld slang 1937) double 6 (from their similarity to the wheels of freight cars)
- gate to stop the dice moving before they have actually come to rest

ARRERS

Many grown-up indoor games are found in that fine old British institution, the pub. One pastime in particular speaks of generations of players with fine imaginations and plenty of time on their hands:
monger a person who deliberately scores many more points than needed to win the game

Robin Hood when a dart sticks into a previous dart married man's side the left-hand side of a dart board (numbers 12, 9, 14, 11, 8 and 16) that would get a reasonable score (the rationale being a married man should always play safe)

right church, wrong pew hitting a double but the wrong number

slop darts that score, but not where you wanted them

masonry darts darts thrown so that they miss the board entirely and hit the wall instead

spray 'n' pray darts thrown by an irate and less talented player, rather quickly bunting the art of throwing while on your knees

FEVVERS

And that’s just a fraction of the jargon. All the scores in darts have their own names too. Remember, when playing darts you’re counting down, not up, starting from a set 301 or 501 and trying to end up with exactly zero, a process which is known as doubling out:

- madhouse double 1 (i.e. what you’re left in until you finish the game by achieving it)
- fevvers a score of 33 (from the 19C Cockney tongue twister: ‘thirty-three feathers on a thrush’s throat’)
- scroat a dart that is aimed for treble 20, but ends up in double 20
- fish and globe a score of 45 (when competing on a fairground darts stall, 45 was a score that traditionally would win the customer a small paper bag of peanuts which later became the offer of a jar (globe) and a goldfish)
- Lord Nelson a score of III (as he had one eye, one arm, one leg)

POKER FACE

A cool head and an expressionless face will serve you well in a game that otherwise relies on luck – unless of course you have other tricks up your sleeve:

- runt a poker hand worth less than a pair
- motown a poker hand consisting of ‘jacks-on-fives’
- vole the winning by one player of all the tricks of a deal; a grand-slam
- pone the player who cuts the cards
BIDDING WAR

The king of card games requires not just luck, but skill of the highest level:

- chicane (1886) the condition in a game of bridge of holding no trumps
- bumble-puppy (1936) a game played at random (of people who play no conventions)
- yarborough (19C) a bridge or whist hand with no card higher than a 9 (from a certain Earl of Yarborough who used to bet 1000 to 1 against the occurrence of such a hand; the actual odds are 1827 to 1)
- flag-flying (1917) to make an overbid that will almost inevitably fail, just to liven up the game
- huddle (US 1934) a period of thought in which a player considers his next move

FULL HOUSE

For those habitués of the pack, there’s a fine range of nicknames for individual cards:

- devil’s bed-post (c.1835) the four of clubs, held to be unlucky
- grace-card (Irish mid 19C) the six of hearts in cards
- curse of Scotland (early 18C) the nine of diamonds (diamonds imply royalty and traditionally every ninth king of Scotland has been considered a tyrant and a curse to that country)
- blankets (1915) the tens in a pack of cards (from the rolling of blankets in the military in tens for the convenience of transport)
- noddy (Gloucestershire) the knave
- suicide king the king of hearts (as the fifteenth-century French picture shows him about to impale himself on his sword)
- the boy with the boots (Anglo-Irish late 19C) the joker in the pack of cards

HIGH STAKES

When you start to bring money into the picture, of course, both dice and cards can easily lose their innocence:

- shill a decoy player, allied to the promoters of the game, who pretends to bet, and is allowed to ‘win’ in street games of three-card monte; his successes are intended to lure the public into laying down their money
- tattogey (underworld slang 1753) one who uses loaded dice to cheat
- langret (mid 16C) a die so loaded that it shows 3 or 4 more often than any other number

DESPERATE BIDS

For some unfortunates, the impulse to win can stop being a game and become more a part of their lives. As the Aussies say, there are some people who would bet on two flies walking up the wall:

- martingale to continue doubling one’s stake after losing in the hope of eventual recovery
- ring in one’s nose to be losing and betting heavily and impetuously in an attempt to get even (like a bull)
- fishing remaining in a card game in the hope of a vital card
- bird dog a small time or novice gambler who hangs around experienced professional gamblers to pick up tips
- nut the living expenses and other overheads that a gambler must meet from his winnings
MONTE CARLO OR BUST

For people like this, home games are soon no longer enough; a professional arena for their habit beckons; and there, of course, under the patina of respectability, pretty much anything goes:

- ladder man a casino employee who sits on a high chair and watches for any errors or cheating by players or croupiers
- booster a bit player in a casino who entices genuine players to bet (and usually lose) their money
- top-hatting in roulette, the surreptitious placing of more casino chips on top of existing ones after the outcome has been decided

BINGO LINGO

Better to switch to a sociable game often favoured by the older woman, which comes with its own inimitable terminology. Two fat ladies (88) and legs eleven are well-known but there are many other traditional coinages:

- 1 buttered scone
- 6 Tom Mix (more modern: chopsticks)
- 7 Gawd’s in ’eaven
- 12 monkey’s cousin (from rhyming slang for dozen)
- 23 a duck and a flea (from the shape of the figures)
- 50 half-way house (1940s) (since there are 100 numbers available to the caller)
- 76 was she worf it? (from 7/6d, the old price of a marriage licence)
- 77 two little crutches (from the shape of the figures)
- 80 Gandhi’s breakfast (as he ‘ate nothing’)

ANORAKS

Or else give it up entirely and settle on a worthwhile and productive hobby:

- notaphily (1970) the collecting of paper currency as a hobby
- deltiologist (1959) a collector of picture postcards
- cartophily (1936) the hobby of collecting cigarette cards
- arctophile (1970s) a person who loves or collects teddy bears
-  cruciverbalist (US slang 1970s) a crossword puzzle addict
- bowerbird (Australian slang) a person who collects an astonishing array of sometimes useless objects hazard (13C) a game of dice forfeit (13C from Latin via Old French) ‘done beyond the bounds of’ the law, a crime depart (13C from Latin via Old French) to divide into parts, distribute

The world of work

He that hopes to thrive must rise at five;
he that has thriven, may lie till seven;
but he that will never thrive may lie till eleven

Even in these days of welfare, or national handbag as Polari slang (see page 157) evocatively has it, most of us have to work at something to make ends meet. However specialized or odd our occupation may be, we can take comfort from the fact that in harsher times, jobs came in all shapes and sizes:

- legger (Yorkshire) a man employed to move canal boats through tunnels by walking on the roof or sides of the tunnel
- fottie (Scottish) a female wool-gatherer
- murenger (Cheshire 1706) an officer appointed to keep the walls of a city in repair
- sewer (Tudor–Stuart) an attendant at a meal who superintended the seating of the guests and the tasting and the serving of the dishes
- shore-man (Cockney) one who searches sewers for rats
- pure-finder (c.1850) a street collector of dogs’ dung
- applesquire (late 16C) the male servant of a prostitute

- gong-farmer (1596) a person who cleaned out privies at night and sold the waste as a fertilizer
- screever (1851) a professional writer of begging letters
- glutman (1796) a temporary customs officer (hired because of his ability to be numerate)
- lodger-remover (underworld slang 1889) a seller of fine-toothed haircombs
- mush faker (1821) an umbrella repairer (‘mushroom-faker’)
- resurrection doctor (1800s) a doctor who buys corpses which are stolen from graves, or has people murdered and delivered to him
- whiffler (1539) an officer armed with a weapon who clears the way for a procession
COLOUR CODED

Nowadays many jobs can be seen as either white or blue collar, where the former are those who wear a suit and work in offices, and the latter those getting their hands dirty in a boilersuit. The designation white came first, in 1921, and blue followed in 1950. Since then imaginative business writers and others have added yet more categories:

- pink (1975) secretaries and other clerical staff
- steel (1980) robots
- grey (1981) skilled technicians; employees whose job descriptions combine some white- and some blue-collar duties
- green (1984) environmentalists
- gold (1985) professionals or those with in-demand skills; employees over 55
- black (1998) miners (especially coal miners) and oil workers
- scarlet (2000) female pornographic shop operators

ELBOW GREASE

But whatever your job, whether it be typing at a word-processor or hauling coal, there is one element in common: at some point you have to get stuck in to doing the work:

- swallow the frog to tackle the hardest task possible
- knife-and-fork it to deal with it bit by bit
- antisocordist (1680) an opponent of laziness or idiocy
- fluttergrub (Sussex) a man who takes a delight in working about in the dirt, and getting into every possible mess
- work for Jesus (US industrial relations) to put in extra work without asking for extra pay

JOBSWORTH

Of course there are always those who manage to slow productivity in some way or other. As the Australians say, they’re as useless as an ashtray on a motorbike:

- chair plug (2006) someone who sits in a meeting but contributes nothing
- boondoggle (1935) to carry out valueless or extremely trivial work in order to convey the impression that one is busy
- to be on the shockell (Warwickshire) to neglect one’s work through beer
- headless nail (1950s) a worker who, once he got into a job, was impossible to get out, even if unsuitable
- sunlighting (US 1980s) doing a quite different job on one day of the working week

BRAINSTORMING

Ideas, as they say, are two a penny. But a sudden brainwave can be worth a month of pointless toil:

- quaesitum (1748) the answer to a problem
- just-add-water (UK current office jargon) an idea that is so brilliantly simple yet effective that it requires little by way of preparation
- limbeck (1599) to rack or fatigue the brain in an effort to have a new idea

NO-DAY

However hard we try not to, we all have those days where our hard work seems to come to nought:
blue duck (New Zealand 1890) something unprofitable

windmill-tilt (US jargon 2006) a fruitless and frustrating venture: attacking imaginary enemies or fighting otherwise-unwinnable battles

salmon day (1990s) the entire day spent swimming upstream only to get screwed in the end

---

PUSHING THE ENVELOPE

The jargon of contemporary corporate life may seem absurd to the outsider, rich as it is in the most colourful of metaphors. But it’s certainly guaranteed to brighten up even the dullest day:

- takeaway nuggets insights or information resulting from a meeting or interaction
- sunset clauses stipulations that a contract or regulation will lapse unless renewed
- to wash its own face to justify or pay for itself
- push the peanut to progress an arduous and delicate task forward
- ketchup-bottle a long period of inertia followed by a burst of exaggerated activity; the unplanned release of pent-up forces
- swallow your own smoke to take responsibility for and/or suffer the consequences of your mistakes

MANAGERIE

Why are things so often discussed in animal terms? Is it because of a desperate subliminal desire to get out of the office?

- shoot the puppy to dare to do the unthinkable
- prairie dogging popping one’s head above an office cubicle out of curiosity or to spy on colleagues
- lipstick on a pig an attempt to put a favourite spin on a negative situation
- a pig in a python a surge in a statistic measured over time
- boiling frog syndrome a company which fails to recognize gradual market change (as a slowly boiled frog may not detect a slow temperature increase)
- moose on the table an issue which everyone in a business meeting knows is a problem but which no one wants to address
- seagull manager a manager who flies in, makes a lot of noise, shits all over everything, and then leaves

THANK GOD IT’S FRIDAY – OFFICE ACRONYMS

- SWOT Strengths, Weaknesses, Opportunities, Threats (a favourite of consultants)
- PICNIC Problem In Chair, Not In Computer
- WOMBAT Waste Of Money, Brains And Time
- POET’S day Piss Off Early Tomorrow’s Saturday (refers to Friday)

---

BULLS AND BEARS

In good times and bad, the highly paid practitioners of both the City London and Wall Street have couched their dubious activities in their specialized jargon:

- J-Lo (Wall Street) the rounding bottom in a stock’s price chart (after the curvaceous Jennifer Lopez)
- Bo Derek (Wall Street) the perfect stock (after her famous film 10)
- poop and scoop to drive down a share price by spreading malicious rumours
- mattressing the term used by other traders and bank managers to hide their results
- barefoot pilgrim someone who has lost everything on the stock market, but might still be persuaded to invest again

catch a falling knife to buy a stock as its price is going down, in the hope that it will go back up, only to have it continue to fall

ROOM AT THE TOP

If you have ability, however, and enough patience to continue to play the game, you will slowly but surely make your way up the corporate ladder:

- royal jelly flashy projects fed to someone whom the boss is grooming for promotion
- marzipan layer the group who are ranked below the very top in their profession, but ahead of the majority
- tribal chiefs bosses who dominate through charisma and patronage
- deceptionist a secretary whose job it is to delay or block potential visitors on behalf of their boss

FIRM HAND

Though we’d all like to believe that hard work is always rewarded, with the best jobs going to the most productive people, the sad fact is that the realities of employing people are not always so straightforward:

- muppet shuffle the redeploymen of problem staff
- featherbedding (1949) the practice of forcing the employer (by union rule etc.) to hire more workers than needed (or to limit his workers’ production)
- kicked upstairs (1697) removed from the scene of action by promotion to an ostensibly higher post
- other shoe syndrome when a number of executives in a firm are being made redundant, those survivors, rather than feeling relieved, find their own morale sabotaged as they wait for ‘the other shoe’ to come down on them
- chainsaw consultants outside experts brought in to reduce the employee headcount (leaving the top brass with clean hands)

THE SACK
So unpleasant is it to ask people to clear their desks and take their skills elsewhere, that a huge number of words and phrases has grown up to euphemistically describe the simple fact of redundancy. You might have been handed your cards or perhaps you’re clearing your desk, considering your position or maybe becoming a consultant. Maybe you’ve been deselected or you’re taking an early bath. Then again, perhaps you’re excess to requirements or you’ve even been excluded. You’re leaving to give time to your other commitments or else you’re off on gardening leave. If you’re lucky you’ll have negotiated a golden handshake rather than merely being given a leave of absence or let go. When you’re given notice let’s hope they don’t say it’s natural wastage or that you’ve been stood down. No, you’re spending more time with your wife and family, as it’s your right to do, even if your contract has been terminated and nobody could really describe this as a voluntary relocation.

SMALL IS BETTER

As for the ruthless companies themselves, why, they’re doing nothing more unnatural than a bit of recruitment. They are in fact degrowing, dehiring, delayering and destaffing. In a process of downsizing some employees have had to take early release. Yes, there is a bit of executive outplacement and force reduction going on. Shall we call it internal reorganization? Nobody is being put out to grass. There’s been a personnel surplus reduction, indeed a straightforward rationalization of the workforce. Some people have been redeployed. There’s been a bit of restructuring, some retrenching and rightsizing, not to mention schedule adjustment, selective separation and skill-mix adjustment. It’s all nothing more than a bit of transitioning, vocational relocation and workforce imbalance correction.

MY OLD MAN’S A …

Once upon a time, we were all quite happy to say exactly what it was we did. But as status has become ever more important, some quite straightforward occupations have developed some quite preposterous titles:

- vision clearance engineer a window cleaner
- stock replenishment adviser a shelf stacker
- dispatch services facilitator a post room worker
- head of verbal communications a receptionist/secretary
- environment improvement technician a cleaner

HAWKERS AND HUCKSTERS

However you dress him (or her) up, there’s no denying that a salesman is always a salesman. It’s an occupation that’s been around since men first started trading beads and barley:

- shafferer (1382) a vendor who enjoys talking while making a sale
- mangonize (Tudor–Stuart) to sell men or boys for slaves
- bend-down plaza (Jamaican English) a row of roadside pedlars, specializing in items that are hard to get in shops, because of import restrictions
- amster (Australian slang 1941) one who works outside a carnival, sideshow, strip club etc. touting the pleasures inside and pulling in the customers
- elick (1748) to stand at a shop-door and invite customers in
- jaw-work! (mid 18C) a cry used in fairs by the sellers of nuts

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS

These guys know the price of everything, and its value too, and they’ve plenty of lingo to describe what they’re trying to get rid of …

- zhing-zhong (Zimbabwean slang) merchandise made in Asia; cheaply made, inexpensive or substandard goods
Halo model a super-product which enhances an entire brand

Orphan (second-hand motor trade jargon) any discontinued model of a car

Widow’s piano inferior instruments sold as bargains (from an advertisement announcing that a widow lady is compelled to sell her piano, for which she will take half price)

… how they do it …

Deaconing (US slang 1866) the practice of packing food so that the finest specimens are visible

Shillaber (North American slang 1913) someone posing as an enthusiastic or successful customer to encourage other buyers

Trotting (auction jargon) the tactic whereby a dealer’s ring will force an outsider up to an unrealistically high bid, at which point they will drop out and leave their rival with a large bill

Bovrilise (1901) to condense an advertisement to essentials

… and those to whom they’re pitching their spiel …

Nose picker a salesman’s derogatory description of a potential client who cannot make up their mind and has no power of decision-making within the firm

Twack (Newfoundland 1937) a shopper who looks at goods, inquires about prices but buys nothing

Grey Panthers (US slang) assertive and/or exigent elderly consumers

THE READIES

At the end of it there’s one glorious commodity that makes it all worthwhile:

Stadge (Lancashire and Cheshire) the date of issue stamped upon coins

Mule (industry jargon) a coin or note which has two mismatched sides

Drink-link (Ireland slang 1990s) a cash dispenser

Squiddish (Northumberland) the twentieth part of a farthing

Chapmoney (Shropshire) money which the seller gives back to the buyer for luck

Wergeld (1214) money paid by the killer’s family by way of compensation to free the offender from further punishment

Fornale (1478) to spend one’s money before it has been earned

LILIES OF THE FIELD

Although for some fortunate people, such vulgar considerations really don’t figure:

Oofy (1896) rich

Slippage (US slang 2005) the percentage of people who get a cheque and forget to cash it

Set the Thames on fire (UK late 18C) to make a great success in life

Stalko (1802) a man who has nothing to do and no fortune to support him but who styles himself as a squire

WORD JOURNEYS

Robot (20C from Czech) servitude, forced labour

Cattle (13C) property, wealth; then (16C) moveable property; then livestock

Up the spout (UK slang b1894) from the spout (lift) used in pawnbrokers’ shops; when items were handed over in return for money they were sent ‘up the spout’ to the storeroom where they stayed until their owner could afford to redeem them

Customer (14C) a customs house officer; then (16C) someone the customs officer had to deal with
BULK AND FILE

Crime and punishment

He that helpeth an evill man,

hurteth him that is good

(1597)

The line between making money by sheer hard work and from more dubious practices has always been thin:

- vigerage (underworld slang 1935) a loan shark’s 20 per cent weekly interest
- flim-flam (underworld slang 1881) the various dodges by which a thief, in changing money, obtains more than he gives from tradesmen and bank-tellers
- mocteroof (costermongers’ jargon 1860) to doctor damaged fruit or vegetables

striping the lot (North American slang) the painting of the parking lot at a new shopping mall with extra-wide spacing for the positioning of cars (this gives the impression of the mall attracting more customers than it really does, and when business picks up, the spaces can be repainted somewhat narrower)

quomodocunquire (1652) to make money by any means possible

MY DEAR FELLOW!

Other ways of getting booty out of people may be more extreme:

- gagging (c.1825) persuading a stranger that he is an old acquaintance and then borrowing money from him
- bull trap (Australia 1930s) a villain who impersonates a policeman and preys on couples in lovers’ lanes, extorting money from those who should not be there
- queer plungers (underworld slang 1785) crooks who threw themselves into the water and pretended to be drowning, before being taken by accomplices to one of the Humane Society houses for the recovery of drowned persons, where they were rewarded with a guinea each for rescuing the bogus victim jibber the kibber (Cornwall 1781) a wrecker’s tactic of fixing a lantern round the neck of a horse which at night appeared like a ship’s light. The ships bearing toward it ran aground, and were plundered by the locals

NOT QUITE MY COLOUR

Even the most upright of us may not be totally straight all the time:

- wardrobing (US slang) buying an item and then returning it after wearing it
- bilk (1717) a person who gives a cabman less than his fare and, when remonstrated with, gives a false name and address
- manoeuvring the apostles (b.1811) robbing Peter to pay Paul (i.e. borrowing from one man to pay another)
- oyster (underworld slang 1920) a society woman employed to wear stolen jewellery in the hope that she will receive an offer from a fence, and will, because of her social position, remain unsuspected by the police

PANHANDLER

Just because you’ve been reduced to begging, it doesn’t mean that you’re dishonest. Having said that, some bums have always known that cheating pays:

- dommerers (1567) men who pretended to be deaf and dumb
- eleymes (b.1811) artificial sores, made by beggars to excite charity
- scaldrum dodge (mid 19C) the practice of deliberately burning the body with a mixture of acids and gunpowder to simulate scars and wounds to soften the hearts of those from whom one begs
- whip-jacks (1562) vagabonds who pretended to be shipwrecked sailors
- aurium (16C) a wandering beggar posing as some kind of priest

CUTPURSE

Others, fitter and more fleet of foot, make better boodle by being proactive:

- maltooling (b.1861) the picking of pockets in omnibuses
- bulk and file (1698) two pickpockets operating together (the bulk jostles the party that is to be robbed and the file steals the treasure)
- reef (c.1860) to draw up a dress-pocket until a purse is within reach of the fingers
- pappy (underworld slang 1910) an elderly man whose clothes and pockets are baggy (the ideal victim for a pickpocket)

SLEIGHT OF HAND

As in many another career paths, the professional pilferer, too, likes to develop his expert knowledge:

- feeder-prigger (late 18C) a thief specializing in silver spoons
- badger (US mid 19C) a rogue who specializes in robbing clients who are visiting a brothel
- offter (underworld slang 1846) a thief who robs theatre patrons during a show
- tinny-hunter (late 18C) a thief who robs people whose homes are burning down, while pretending to give assistance
- vamper (mid 19C) a thief who deliberately starts fights between others in order to rob them in the confusion
- tosher (b.1859) one who steals copper from the bottom of ships moored in the Thames
ARTFUL DODGERS

Other tricks of the trade definitely make a crook’s life easier and more productive:

- trigging the jigger (early 19C) placing a small piece of paper (trig) in the front door keyhole of a house that is presumed to be uninhabited; if the paper is still there a day later, the robber can believe that the house is empty and can be broken into safely
- treacle-man (late 19C) a good-looking man who works as a decoy for burglars by charming the housemaid while the gang slip in unnoticed
- snudge (underworld slang 1665) a thief who hides himself under a bed in order to rob the house
- little snakesman (1781) a little boy who gets into a house through the sink-hole, and then opens the door for his accomplices

DOLPHINS AND TURTLES

Underworld slang, old and new, covers a whole range of dodgy activity, from the relatively harmless to the downright evil:

- shoulder surf (UK current slang) to use a pair of binoculars to read the PIN of people using cash dispensers
- slaughter (1950s) an immediate dumping ground for recently stolen property, before it is shared out or hidden more permanently and securely
- turn turtle (early 19C) to flip a carriage upside-down
- airmail (US prison jargon 1950s) concrete, bricks and so on hurled down from rooftops onto patrol cars responding to a call
- rifling (underworld slang 1885) plundering dead bodies in the river (especially the Thames) and turning them adrift again
- make one’s bones (New York slang 1969) to kill a person as a requirement for membership in a criminal gang

OLD BILL

One gang who know more about all this than most are society’s upholders of the law, who have a few tricks of their own up their sleeves:

- flash roll (police jargon) a wad of money which is never actually used, but is flashed ostentatiously around to convince a criminal, e.g. a drug dealer, that one wishes to make a purchase, at which point an arrest will be made
- Kojak with a Kodak (US 1970s) a policeman manning a radar speed trap
- mule kick (US slang 2005) the act of standing with one’s back to the front door and kicking the door in
- attitude-adjuster (US black slang) a club; a police officer’s stick
- to get a fanner (Hobo slang) to be hit on the soles while sleeping on a park bench and moved on by the police
- ghetto bird (US slang) a police helicopter
- wiggle seat (US police jargon) a special lie detector that can be fitted to a chair and which will measure the bodily reactions of a suspect to various crucial questions

BAD APPLES

Upstanding members of society can only hope that their local rozzers are worthy of the power entrusted in them:

- mumping (UK slang 1970) the acceptance by the police of small gifts or bribes from tradespeople
- swim in golden grease (UK slang 17C) to receive many bribes
- banana (UK street slang 1990s) a corrupt police officer (initially of the Special Patrol Group because they were, allegedly, yellow, bent and hanging around in bunches)
- shoo-fly (US slang 1870) a policeman, usually in plain clothes, whose job is to watch and report on other police accommodation collar (US police jargon) an arrest only made to raise the officer’s arrest record and thus improve his standing in the hierarchy

JUST DESERTS

There are some who would prefer that criminals were treated with the summary justice of yesteryear; without faffing around with all that tedious business of innocent until proved guilty:

alfet (c.1000) a vat of boiling water into which the accused plunged his arm in lieu of a trial keelhaul (1626) to punish in the seamen’s way, by dragging the criminal under water on one side of the ship and up again on the other ride the stang (UK b.1828) to be carried on a pole through the town on men’s shoulders and pelted with refuse for the amusement of a hooting crowd (a derisive punishment for a breach of decorum or morality, especially on the part of a married man) eorsned (Anglo-Saxon law c.1000) a trial by ordeal that required a suspect to eat a piece of barley bread and cheese to test his innocence (if guilty, it was believed the bread would cause convulsions and choking) whiffler (underworld slang 1859) a fellow who cries out in pain

PETTIFOGGERS

Undoubtedly the intervention of the legal profession does complicate matters, and sometimes completely unnecessarily:

kilburn (police jargon) the official police notebook that is produced in court (rhyming slang: Kilburn Priory for diary) gunner (US slang) a law student who always needs to volunteer an answer to show off how smart he are ambulance-chaser (underworld slang 1897) a lawyer who attends scenes of accidents and hospitals to get business from the injured or bereaved, who are not in a position to resist dock asthma (police and prison jargon 1950s) gasps of (usually feigned) surprise and disbelief by prisoners in the dock boot-eater (1880) a juror who would rather ‘eat his boots’ than find a person guilty

PORRIDGE

A spell inside should be enough to make anyone think twice about reoffending:

oubliette (Scott: Ivanhoe 1819) a dungeon whose only entrance is in the ceiling dry bath (1933) a search of a prisoner who has been stripped naked broken arse (New Zealand) a prisoner who has sided with the authorities and thus ranked the lowest in the inmate hierarchy

- earpy (1940s) locked away in one’s cell at night (from Latin tag carpe diem for ‘seize the day’)
- to polish the King’s iron with one’s eyebrows (underworld slang 1785) to look longingly out of prison windows

Although not necessarily so:

- gate fever (UK slang 2007) terror at the prospect of release from prison
- phoenix (underworld slang 1925) one who enters the world after long imprisonment
- boomerang (US slang) to return to prison almost immediately on finishing the last sentence

CLEAN SHIRT

Career criminals have always had to make calculations about the possible punishment they may have to endure, leading to a wide range of names for different prison sentences. Here’s a selection:

- thirteen clean shirts (late 19C) three months’ imprisonment (at the rate of one shirt a week)
- magazine (US 1920s) a six month jail sentence (the time it would take to read one if one could barely read)
- the clock (Australian slang 1950) twelve months’ imprisonment (from the hours on a clock face)
- pontoon (UK prison jargon 1950) a twenty-one month jail sentence (from the card-game in which a score of twenty-one is the optimum hand)
- rouf (UK back slang* 1851) a four year sentence
- taxi (US slang 1930) between five and fifteen years’ imprisonment (from the fares in cents displayed in New York taxis)
- neves (UK back slang* 1901) a seven year sentence
- work under the armpits (early 19C) to confine one’s criminality to such activities that would be classed as petty larceny (bringing a maximum sentence of seven years’ transportation rather than hanging)
- working above the armpits (early 19C) to commit crimes that could lead to one’s execution

WORD JOURNEYS

- to pay on the nail (1596) from a practice in medieval markets where instant justice was dealt to those who reneged on agreements or cheated their customers. Eventually it was decided that accounts be settled at counters (short pillars known as nails) in the open market place and in front of witnesses. Payments were placed on these counters for everyone to see that all was correct
- not enough room to swing a cat (1771) refers to the whip used on board ships for dealing out punishment (the whip started as a cat-of-three-tails but became a cat-of-nine-tails by the end of the seventeenth century; this method of punishment continued until 1875)
- nipper (16C) a thief, person who nipped or pinched; then (19C) a costermonger’s boy attendant
- villain (14C from Latin via Old French) a worker on a country estate (in feudal terms the lord was the great landowner, and under him were a host of tenants called villains; the notion of wickedness and worthlessness is simply the effect of aristocratic pride and exclusivity)
BUNTING TIME

Matters of love

After your fling,
watch for the sting

(1917)

The beginning of love is often physical. In hiphop male attractiveness is described as pimp-juice and its female counterpart as milkshake, contemporary versions of a long tradition:

- bobbant (Wiltshire) of a girl: forward, romping
- featous (mid 14C) of a man: handsome, good looking
- elipsome (1816) eminently embraceable

DISCO JUDGES

Women have long known just how critical others can be of their looks, whether they be English country folk or American teenagers:

- sinful-ordinary (Wiltshire) plain to the last degree in looks
- bridlegged (Cheshire) a farmer’s contemptuous description of a woman as having legs not strong enough to work on the farm
- sphinx (US black teen slang) a woman who is beautiful from the neck up
- Medusa (US black teen slang) a woman who is beautiful from the neck down
- strobe-light honey (US black teen slang) a woman who seems attractive in flickering light but not otherwise

ZEPPELINS

One aspect in particular often receives close attention:

- bathycolpian (1825) having a deep cleavage
- headlamps (UK slang early 20C) female breasts: this was when large, raised car headlights were the norm (a century earlier the common expression was barges)
- dead heat in a Zeppelin race (UK slang) an admiring description of large breasts
- fore-buttocks (Pope: The Dunciad 1727) breasts
- Cupid’s kettledrums (18C) breasts

SUPERSIZE ME

So how do you get your feelings across? Do fries go with that shake? was a phrase called out by black men in 1970s America to a passing woman they fancied; while the object of admiration might mutter to her friend: He can put his shoes under my bed anytime …

- boombaloomba (Australian slang) an expression of a man’s attraction to a woman
- look that needs suspenders (1940s) a very interested glance at a woman (the suspenders were needed to keep the man’s eyeballs attached to their sockets)
HUNTER DITHERERS

Not that everyone finds it easy to be so forward:

- stick-up (Wiltshire) to make the first tentative advances towards courting
- sangle (late 18C) to follow a woman without actually addressing her
- quirkyalone (US slang 1999) someone who just wants the right person to come along at the right time even if that means waiting

FAINT HEART

Sometimes one just has to take the risk and get a bit proactive:

- tapper (1950s) a boy who repeatedly pestered a girl for a date
- wingwoman (US slang from the film Top Gun 1986) a professional female matchmaker who escorts a man to a bar or club, engages in light conversation to draw in other females, and then withdraws
- strike breaker (1920s) a young woman who was ready to date her friend’s beau when a couple’s romance was coming to an end
- rabbit’s-kiss (Anglo-Manx) a penalty in the game of ‘forfeits’ in which a man and woman have each to nibble the same piece of straw until their lips meet

DEelightful

Until 1958 debutantes and their mothers exchanged information about the respectable young men to whom they were introduced by using a special code:

- FU Financially Unsound
- MTF Must Touch Flesh
- MSC Makes Skin Crawl
- NSIT Not Safe In Taxis
- VVSITPQ Very, Very Safe In Taxis, Probably Queer

THE WILDER SHORES OF LOVE

As homosexuality was illegal in the UK until 1967, the secret language of Polari was used to disguise gay subculture from the disapproving gaze of the law. It was originally used by circus and fairground performers who were equally keen to communicate with each other without their audience understanding. Drawn from Italian, Yiddish, Cockney rhyming slang and full of backwards words (such as ecaf for face) Polari provided various terms that we all use today, such as drag, camp and bimbo, as well as some less well-known but equally colourful expressions:
omipolone a gay man (literally man-woman; a lesbian was poloneomi, a woman-man) alamo hot for him basket the bulge of male genitals through trousers naff awful, dull, bad (said to stand for Not Available For Fing)

CHEAP DATE

Whatever your proclivities, there are numerous reasons why one should beware of giving too much too soon:

souch cootie (US 1920s) a poor or miserly man who prefers to court a woman in her own house than take her out on the town flat-wheeler (US college slang 1920s) a young man whose idea of entertaining a girl is to take her for a walk cream-pot love (b.1811) professed by insincere young men to dairymaids, to get cream and other goods from them

GETTING DOWN TO IT

In the less permissive 1950s, a Nottingham goodnight was the phrase used of a courting couple who had got back from their date, and then slammed the door and said ‘goodnight’ loudly before retiring quietly to the sofa, hoping they would not be disturbed for some time …

suaviation (1656) a love kiss cow-kissing (US slang mid 19C) kissing with much movement of the tongues and lips kellygagger (1920s) a courting male who liked to kiss his sweetheart in hallways bundling (b.1811) a man and a woman sleeping in the same bed, he with his clothes on, and she with her petticoat on

COUNTRY LOVING

But if the weather’s good, why bother to go home at all?
sproag (Scotland late 16C) to run among the haystacks after the girls at night to give a girl a green gown (late 16C) to tumble her onto the grass bunting time (1699) when the grass is high enough to hide young men and maids courting boondock (Tennessee campus slang b.1950) to neck, pet or make love in an automobile gulch (Newfoundland 1895) to frequent a sheltered hollow to engage in sexual intimacy

SEALED WITH A LOVING KISS – LOVE LETTER ACRONYMS

During the Second World War all mail was opened and read by the official Censor. So acronyms of places written on the backs of envelopes were used to convey secret messages of love (and lust) between servicemen and their wives or girlfriends:

• HOLLAND Hope Our Love Lasts And Never Dies
• MEXICO CITY May Every Kiss I Can Offer Carry Itself To You
• MALAYA My Ardent Lips Await Your Arrival
• CHINA Come Home I Need Affection
• NORWICH (K)nickers Off Ready When I Come Home
• BURMA Be Undressed Ready My Angel
• EGYPT Eager to Grab Your Pretty Tits
• SIAM Sexual Intercourse At Midnight
ALL LOVED UP

Limerence (US Connecticut 1977) is the word for that initial exhilarating rush of falling in love, the state of ‘being in love’. During that time the besotted of either sex should be careful not to deff out, the American slang for women who immediately lose contact with their female friends after acquiring a steady boyfriend. And this is just one of the pitfalls of sudden love:

- fribbler (1712) one who professes rapture for a woman, but dreads her consent
- batmobilizing (US slang) putting up protective emotional shields just as a relationship enters an intimate, vulnerable stage (with reference to the car’s retracting armour)

THEY FLEE FROM ME

Once things start to go wrong, the slide can be all too rapid …

- to wear the willow (late 16C) to have been abandoned by one’s lover

… so do try and avoid being cynical …

- sorbet sex (US slang popularized by Sex and the City) a casual sexual relationship undertaken in the period between two more serious relationships
- pull a train (US slang 1965) sexual intercourse with a succession of partners (like a string of boxcars, they have to be coupled and uncoupled)

… or sentimental …

- desiderium (Swift: letter to Pope 1715) a yearning for a thing one once had but has lost
- anacampserote (1611) a herb that can bring back departed love

DROIT DE SEIGNEUR

Take heart from the fact that anything goes; and the history of love tells of some decidedly odd arrangements:

- gugusse (early 1880s) an effeminate youth who frequents the private company of priests
- panmixis (1889) a population in which random mating takes place
Shunamitism (b. 1901) the practice of an old man sleeping with, but not necessarily having sex with, a young woman to preserve his youth (the rationale was that the heat of the young woman would transfer to the old man and revitalize him, based on the Biblical story of King David and Abishag)

HE DOESN’T UNDERSTAND ME

Just beware the types for whom lovemaking has become habitual (or even professional):

- mud-honey (Tennyson: Maud 1855) the dirty pleasures of men about town
- cougar (Canadian slang 2005) an older woman on the prowl, preferably for a younger man
- lovertine (1603) someone addicted to sex
- play checkers (US gay jargon 1960s) to move from seat to seat in a cinema in search of a receptive sex partner
- twopenny upright (UK slang 1958) the charge made by a prostitute for an act of sexual intercourse standing up out of doors

WORD JOURNEYS

- boudoir (French 18C) a place to sulk or pout in
- friend (Old English) a lover; then (12C) a relative or kinsman
- buxom (12C) obedient, compliant; then (16C) plump and comely
- harem (17C from Turkish via Arabic) forbidden to others; then sacred to the women and their apartments
Marriage and family life

Marriage halves our griefs, doubles our joys,
and quadruples our expenses

(1902–4)

However giddy and capricious at first, it’s certainly true that Love moves, inexorably, towards the recognized and the formalized:

- wooer-bab (Burns: Halloween 1785) a garter tied below the knee of a young man as a sign that he was about to make an offer of marriage
- subarrhation (Swinburne: Spousals 1686) a betrothal accomplished by the man’s showering presents on his incipient bride
- acquaintance (Shropshire) a fiancée
- maiden-rent (17C) a fee paid by every tenant in the Welsh manor of Builth at their marriage (given to the lord for his omitting the ancient custom of marcheta, whereby he spent the first night with his tenant’s new wife)
- gluepot (b.1811) a parson (from joining men and women together in matrimony)

IN THE PAPERS

In the UK, people of a certain class have traditionally advertised marriage, just as they do births and deaths, with an announcement in their newspaper of choice. This trio defining a person’s life is colloquially known as hatched, matched and dispatched (with some believing that these really are the only times your name should appear in the papers). In Australia, similar announcements are known as yells, bells and knells. But though established through long custom, marriage has come in many varied and interesting forms …

- paranymph (1660) the best man or bridesmaid at a wedding
- levirate (1725) the custom requiring a man to marry his brother’s widow
- puanalua (1889) a group marriage in which wives’ sisters and husbands’ brothers were considered spouses
- adelphogamy (1926) a form of marriage in which brothers share a wife or wives jockum-gagger (1797) a man living on the prostitution of his wife bite’s blind (US slang) a wife who acts as a cover for a homosexual male opsigamy (1824) marrying late in life

VIRAGO

Maritality (1812) is a charming word, meaning ‘the excessive affection a wife feels for her husband’, while levament (1623) describes one of the best aspects of a good marriage, ‘the comfort a man has from his wife’. But in general the words and phrases our language has thrown up speak of more demanding realities, with wives all too often in the frame:

loudspeaker (underworld slang 1933) a wife alarm clock (US slang 1920s) a nagging woman tenant at will (late 18C) one whose wife arrives at the alehouse to make him come home ten commandments (mid 15C) the ten fingers and thumbs especially of a wife curtain-lecture (b.1811) a reproof given by a wife to her husband in bed cainsham smoke (1694) the tears of a man who is beaten by his wife (deriving from a lost story relating to Keynsham, near Bristol)

AFTERPLAY

Love and marriage, the song goes, go together ‘like horse and carriage’. So why doesn’t fidelity always fit so easily into the equation?

wittol (15C) a man who is aware of his wife’s unfaithfulness but doesn’t mind or acquiesces court of assistants (late 18C) the young men with whom young wives, unhappy in their marriages to older men, are likely to seek solace to pick a needle without an eye (West Indian) of a young woman, to give oneself in marriage to a man whom one knows will be of no use as a sexual partner gandermooner (1617) a husband who strays each month, during the time of the month when his wife is ‘unavailable’ stumble at the truckle-bed (mid 17C) to ‘mistake’ the maid’s bed for one’s wife’s

UP THE DUFF

The desire to expand the family is all too natural; though the actual circumstances of conception may vary considerably:

beer babies (Sussex) babies sired when the man was drunk Band-Aid baby (UK slang) a child conceived to strengthen a faltering relationship basting (UK slang 2007) being with a gay male friend who offers to give the baby a woman longs for sooterkin (1658) an imaginary kind of birth attributed to Dutch women from sitting over their stoves

THE STORK DESCENDS

In parts of America they say you have swallowed a watermelon seed when you become pregnant. In Britain, children were once told that the new baby boy in the family had been found under the gooseberry bush, while the girl was found in the parsley bed:

omphalomancy (1652) divination by counting the knots in the umbilical cord of her first born to predict the number of children a mother will have nom de womb (US slang 2005) a name used by an expectant parent to refer to their unborn child infanticipate (US 1934) to be expecting a child quob (b.1828) to move as the embryo does in the womb; as the heart does when throbbing pigeon pair (Wiltshire dialect) a boy and a girl (when a mother has only two children)

PRIVATE VIEWS

As soon as Baby appears, of course, there is much excitement. Relatives and friends crowd round to check out the new arrival, and any gossip about the timing of the pregnancy melts away:

barley-child (Shropshire) a child born in wedlock, but which makes its advent within six months of marriage (alluding to the time which elapses between barley sowing and barley harvest) jonkin (Yorkshire) a tea-party given to celebrate a birth of a child crying-cheese (Scotland) a ritual where cheese was given to neighbours and visitors when a child was born

FIRST STEPS

Then there is the long, slow process of bringing up the little darling; beset with many dangers, but not, fortunately, as many as in the past …

vagitus (Latin 17C) a new-born child’s cry marriage music (late 17C) the crying of children blow-blow (Jamaican English 1955) babbling baby-talk chrisom (c.1200) a child that dies within a month of its birth (so called from the chrisom-cloth, anointed with holy unguent, which the children wore until they were christened)
quiddle (Midlands) to suck a thumb gangrel (1768) a child just beginning to walk dade (Shropshire) to lead children when learning to walk

CHIPS OFF THE OLD BLOCK

It’s an exhausting time, but hopefully rewarding, whatever the extra commitments:

antipelargy (1656) the love of children for their parents philostorgy (1623) natural affection, such as that between parents and children butter-print (Tudor–Stuart) a child bearing the stamp of its parents’ likeness stand pad (Cockney) to beg in crowded streets with a written statement round one’s neck, such as ‘wife and five kids to support’ sandwich generation (Canadian slang) those caring for young children and elderly parents at the same time (usually ‘baby boomers’ in their 40s or 50s)

POPPING OFF

Sadly, not all men seem able to stay the course:

zoo daddy (US slang) a divorced father who rarely sees his child or children (he takes his kids to the zoo when exercising his visiting rights) baby fathers (Jamaican English 1932) males who abandon their partner and offspring goose father (US slang 2005) a father who lives alone having sent his spouse and children to a foreign country to learn English or do some other form of advanced study jacket (Jamaican English 2007) a man tested and proven not to be the father of the children said to be his

EARLY PROMISE
And what a course it can prove to be …

_glaikut_ (Aberdeenshire) of a child too fond of its mother and refusing to be parted from her at any time _ghippie-burdie_ (Scotland) a promise made to a child to pacify them _killcrop_ (1652) a child who is perpetually hungry _vuddle_ (Hampshire and Wiltshire) to spoil a child by injudicious petting _ankle-sucker_ (Worcesthershire) a child or person dependent on others colguit

_— COLTISH —_

… not necessarily made any easier as the offspring grow older …

_dandiprat_ (1583) an urchin _daddle_ (Suffolk) to walk like a young child trying to copy its father _kiggle_ (East Anglian) to carry something too heavy to be carried easily (e.g. of a child with a puppy) _airling_ (1611) a person who is both young and thoughtless

… though getting them outside in the fresh air is always a good plan …

_grush_ (Hiberno-English) of children, to scramble for coins and other small gifts thrown at them
_duck’s dive_ (Newfoundland) a boy’s pastime of throwing a stone into the water without making a splash _poppinoddles_ (Cumberland 1885) a boyish term for a somersault _triltigo_ (Derbyshire) a word used to start boys off in a race _treer_ (c.1850) a boy who avoids organized sports, but plays a private game with one or two friends (by the trees at the side of the ground)

_ABC_ School can take some of the heat off the parents …

_abecedary_ (1440) a table or book containing the alphabet, a primer _minerval_ (1603) a gift given in gratitude by a pupil to a teacher _brosier_ (Eton College c.1830) a boy with no more pocket money _nix!_ (1860) a warning especially among schoolboys and workmen of somebody’s approach

—— MANNERS MAKYTH MAN ——

At Winchester College, as elsewhere in times gone by, discipline was strictly maintained by corporal punishment. If it wasn’t from the authorities, you could count on the bullies for trouble:
tin gloves (c.1840) a criss-cross of blisters methodically made by a bully on the back of a victim’s hand bibler (c.1830) six cuts on the back tund (1831) to flog a boy across the shoulders with a ground-ash rabber (1831) a blow on the back of their neck with the edge of the open palm to sport eyesight (1920) to deliver all the blows on the same spot in beating

FIGHTING YOUR BATTELS

Similar slang was adopted at many universities. At Oxford, your battels (Tudor–Stuart) were (and still are) your college bills; if you didn’t get to an exam you ploughed (1853) it; and academic nudity (b.1909) was appearing in public without a cap or gown. At Cambridge, in Victorian times, a brute (19C) was one who had not matriculated and a sophister (1574) was an undergraduate in his second or third year. In both places a whiffler (c.1785) was one who examined candidates for degrees, while at Dublin a sizar (1588) was one who got a college allowance. At Aberdeen, from the eighteenth century on, you were a bajan in your first year, a semi in your second, a tertian in your third, and a magistrand (1721) if staying for a fourth year to sit an MA.

JUST MISSED A GEOFF

Much more recently, a new slang has grown up to describe the various kinds of degrees that one may hope to get. The much-prized First has been known as a Geoff (Hurst), a Damien (Hirst) or a Patty (Hearst), a raging (thirst) or a James (the First). A 2:1 is known as an Attila (the Hun) or a Made-In (Taiwan). A 2:2 is known as a Desmond (Tutu) and a Third as a Douglas (Hurd), a Thora (Hird), or even a Gentleman’s Degree, though who would admit to having one of those these days?

RETURN TO THE COOP

Education over, for more than a few the appeal of moving back home can be strong, especially in these days of high rents and generous parental expectations:

witesters (US slang) fully grown men and women who still live with their parents ant hill family (UK slang) the trend whereby children move back in with their parents so that all can work together towards group financial goals

LIFE IS SHORT

Life races on, and all too soon comes that point when some feel the need to start lying about their age …

agerasia (1706) looking younger than one really is paracme (1656) the point at which one’s prime is past menoporsche (UK slang) the phenomenon of middle-aged men attempting to recapture their lost youth by buying an expensive sports car

… a pointless activity, for your years will always catch up with you:

prosopagnosia (1950) an inability to recognize familiar faces sew the button on (UK slang b.1898) to have to jot down at once what you wish to remember astereognosis (1900) the loss of the ability to recognize the shapes and spatial relationships of objects

WORD JOURNEYS
debonair (13C from Old French: de bonne aire) of good disposition or family puny (16C from Old French: puis né) born later, a junior; then inexperienced husband (Old English) master of a house; then (13C) husbandman: tiller of the soil (an extension of his duties); then (15C) housekeeper or steward; then (16C) a man who managed affairs generally
OYSTER PARTS Culture

Literature should be my staff but not my crutch
(Scott: Lockhart’s Life 1830)

here’s little doubt that as a culture we have a passion for a good story well told:

- anecdotard (1894) an old man given to telling stories
- ackamarackus (US slang 1934) a specious, characteristically involved tale that seeks to convince by bluff
- SHAZAM (1940) Solomon’s wisdom, Hercules’ strength, Atlas’s stamina, Zeus’s power, Achilles’ courage and Mercury’s speed (an acronymic magic word like ‘abracadabra’ used to introduce an extraordinary story)
- shark-jump (US media jargon 1997) instances that signal the imminent decline of a TV series by introducing plot twists inconsistent with the previous plot
- bridges, bridges! (c.1880) a cry to arrest a long-winded story

THE BEST WORDS IN THE BEST ORDER

Poetry too seems to be in the blood, and judging by the activity in pubs around the nation, in no danger of declining:

- genethliacon (1589) a poem written for someone’s birthday
- amphigory (1809) a poem that seems profound but is nonsense
- randle (b.1811) a set of nonsensical verses, repeated in Ireland by schoolboys and young people, who have been guilty of breaking wind backwards before their companions
- hapsodomancy (1727) fortunetelling by picking a passage of poetry at random
- musophobist (Swinburne 1880) a person who regards poetry with suspicious dislike Scribblers still throng a land where people have long been under the illusion that there is something glamorous about the business of writing:

- purlieus (1808) a dash or flourish at the end of a written word
- wegotism (1797) the excessive use of ‘we’ in writing (particularly in newspaper editorials)
- parisology (1846) the use of ambiguous language or evasive writing
- macaronic (1638) mixing words from different languages
- Patavinity (1607) the use of local slang or expressions when writing
- elock-father (c.1639) a pretended author whose name is put forth to conceal the real author

CRITICAL MASS

The best advice for authors is Somerset Maugham’s: ‘Don’t read your reviews, dear boy. Measure them’ …

- Zoilist (1594) a critic, especially one who is unduly severe or who takes joy in faultfinding (after the fourth-century Greek critic)
- histriomastix (Tudor–Stuart) a severe critic of playwrights
- squabash (1818) to crush with criticism
- praise sandwich (US slang Houston 1987) criticism prefaced by and followed by compliments
BOOKS DO FURNISH A ROOM

Here remains one important group that no one in the business can afford to take for granted – the dear old readers:

- en chiridion (Late Latin 1541) a book carried in the hand for reference
- th umbscall (Shropshire) a piece of paper or card inserted in a book to mark a page
- bibliotaph (1824) a person keeping his or her books secret or locked up
- grille-peeerer (1940s) one of a group of clergymen who used to haunt the stacks of the London Library to look up the skirts of women browsing above
- to have a face-ticket (British Museum Reading Room 1909) to be so well known to the janitors that one is not asked to present one’s ticket

ARE YOU WORKING?

Sitting in a corner with a mere book has never been enough for another creative group who flourish in our supposedly inhibited culture:

- oyster part an actor who appears and speaks or acts only once (like an oyster he opens but once)
- nap-nix (c. 1860) an amateur playing minor parts for experience
- erawk (1930s) a performer acting as an animal imitator
- eabotinage (1894) behaviour typical of a second-rate actor or strolling player, implying a tendency to play to the gallery or overact
- come back Tuesday pseudo-friendly advice from theatrical directors and management to hopefuls really meaning ‘go away!’
- flag-fallen (16C) unemployed (used first of actors: the playhouse flag was lowered where there was no performance)

AGAIN FROM THE TOP

Many are the tricks of the trade to be learnt in this most demanding of callings; and theatre has developed a fine jargon to describe it:

- swallow the cackle to learn a part
- ping to speak one’s lines softly, with no special emphasis
- pong to speak in blank verse after forgetting one’s lines
- stagger the first rehearsal without a script in one’s hands
- wing to fasten one’s script to one of the wing flats or some part of the scenery when one has failed to learn it properly and thus needs an occasional reference during the performance
- Mummerset (J. B. Priestley: Festival at Farbridge 1951) fake peasant accents adopted by actors to denote a supposed rural origin (from a mix of Somerset and mummer)

SMOKE AND MIRRORS

Normal costume apart, a range of cunning accessories assist the thespian’s art:

- he ar t the padding out of their tights by acrobats, actors etc. to prevent an otherwise painful fall
- wafters (Geordie) swords made with blunt edges for performers
- bronteon (Ancient Greek 1849) a device used in theatre or movies to create thunder
- scruto (1853) a spring trap-door, flush with the floor of a stage, for a ghost to rise through, for sudden falls and other effects
- pepper’s ghost a trick used to create a ‘ghost’ on stage by using an inclined sheet of plate glass onto which an actor can be projected as if ‘walking through air’
bird’s nest crepe wool used to construct false beards

LIGHTS UP

But once you’re out there, darling, all you can do is stick to the script and hope for the best:

- ventilator a play so appallingly bad that the audience leaves well before the final curtain, and their seats are filled only with fresh air
- exsibilation (1640) the collective hisses of a disapproving audience
- handcuffed an actor’s description of an audience who will not applaud
- stiff (1930s) a terrible joke, rewarded only by silence
- soso (1930s) a joke rewarded by a smile, but not a laugh
- gravy easy laughs from a friendly audience
- crack the monica (music hall jargon c.1860) to ring the bell to summon a performer to reappear

BUMS ON SEATS

Though you may be deep into your role, you’ll still have one eye on the view beyond the footlights:

- plush family empty seats in the auditorium (i.e. the plush-covered seats that can be seen from the stage)
- paper the house to give away free theatre tickets in order to fill up an undersubscribed performance
- whiskey seats seats on the aisle (popular both with critics, who need to get out before the rush and phone in their reviews, and those who like to escape to the bar when the action palls)
- baskets are in a full house (from the one-time practice of leaving the prop baskets as security against the income of a touring company: if the house didn’t guarantee the payment of the theatre’s rent, the props were theoretically forfeit)

MAGIC CIRCLE

But let’s please never forget that the stage is not simply a venue for actors. Other fine artists offer equally enjoyable entertainment:

- burn (conjuring jargon) staring at the magician’s hands without averting your gaze, no matter what misdirection is thrown
- riffle (conjuring jargon) to let cards come out of the hand, creating a noise
- grimoire (French 1849) a magician’s manual of black magic for invoking demons
- cultrivorous (1846) actual or illusory knife-swallowing
- drollic (1743) pertaining to a puppet show
swazzle (1942) a mouthpiece used by a puppeteer to make the squeaking voice of Mr Punch

MORE WHIFFLE

Other performers don’t even need a stage. From break to Morris dance, a pavement or floor is more than enough:

gaff a dancer’s belt, the protection under his tights for his genitals garlic (17C) a lively jig

applejack (1980s) a basic move to challenge another breakdancer to a competition, squatting down, falling back onto your hands, and kicking one leg high in the air, then springing back onto both legs

whiffler the man with the whip in Morris dancing

CROONERS

Singers, too, can operate anywhere:

griddle (b.1851) to sing in the streets

woodshedding (1976) spontaneous barbershop singing (originally meaning a place to rehearse music privately)

barcarole (French 1779) a gondolier’s song numblelow (1315) a meaningless song or refrain sung by sailors while rowing a boat (e.g. Heave Ho or Hey- Ho)

aubade (Franco-Provençal 1678) a song at sunrise scolion (Ancient Greek 1603) a song sung in turn by the guests at a banquet

ROCK FOLLIES

Though why be a busker when you could be a star? Or at least get as near to one as possible …

guerrilla gig a performance by a band in an unlikely venue, where they play until they are evicted mosh to engage in uninhibited, frenzied activities with others near the stage at a rock concert (mosh pit the place near the stage at a rock concert where moshing occurs) wollyhumper a bouncer employed by a rock band to make sure no fans manage to climb on stage while they play or, if they have climbed up, to throw them down again

résumé on a rope a backstage pass woodpecker people who nod their heads to the music being played while paying no attention

GOOGLE BOX

There is one contemporary venue where almost all performers are happy to be seen; and behind the scenes in TV land, too, a whole rich lingo has grown up:

•oss in television news, an onscreen handover from one host to another golden rolodex the small handful of experts who are always quoted in news stories and asked to be guests on discussion shows bambi someone who freezes in front of the camera (like a deer caught in headlights) elambake the possibility of two or three commentators all talking over each other and thus confusing listeners goldfishing one politician talking inaudibly in an interview (you can see his lips move but only hear the reporter’s words)

WORD JOURNEYS
explode (16C from Latin) to reject; then (17C) to drive out by clapping, to hiss off the stage tragedy (16C from Ancient Greek) a goat song anecdote (from Ancient Greek) unpublished things; then (17C) secret history charm (from Latin carmen) a song; then (13C) an incantation, the singing or reciting of a verse that was held to have magic power enthusiasm (from Ancient Greek) divinely inspired; then (17C) possession by a god, poetic frenzy; misguided religious emotion
DIMBOX AND QUOCKERWODGER
Military and political concerns

Soldiers in peace are like chimneys in summer
(1598)

We all claim to love a peaceful time, but somehow squabbles keep breaking out:

- breed-bate (1593) someone looking for an argument
- conspue (1890) to spit on someone or something with contempt
- cobble-nobble (Shropshire) to rap on the head with the knuckles
- donnybrook (1852) a street brawl (named after the famously violent annual Fair in Dublin)
- recumbentibus (b.1546) a knock-down blow either verbal or physical
- sockdolager (1830) a decisive blow or answer that settles a dispute

SHADOW DANCING

Fights come in all shapes and sizes:

- batrachomyomachy (b.1828) a silly and trifling altercation (literally, a battle between frogs and mice)
- sciamachy (1623) fighting with a shadow or with an imaginary enemy
- holmgang (1847) a duel to the death fought on an island
- ro-sham-bo (US slang 1998) a competition employed to determine the ownership of an object when in dispute
  (the two parties kick each other in the groin until one falls to the ground: the person left standing wins)
- hieromachy (1574) a conflict of ecclesiastics, a fight between persons of the cloth

… and brave the person who tries to come between the opposing parties:

- dimbox (Scotland) the ‘smoother-over’ of disputes, an expert at getting others to make up
- bedder’s lick (Scott: The Abbot 1820) the blow one receives in trying to part combatants
- autoclaps (Jamaican English 1970s) trouble that leads to more trouble

GOING REGIMENTAL

When it comes to the bigger disagreements between nations, we still, it seems, need armies to protect us – the perfect breeding ground for specialized lingo and tradition:

- boots (b.1811) the youngest officer in a regimental mess, whose duty it is to skink (b.1811) to stir the fire, snuff any candles and ring the bell
- militaster (1640) a soldier without military skill or knowledge
- egg (early 20C) an inexperienced airman, not yet ‘hatched’
- knapsack descent (late 19C) a soldier or soldiers in every generation of a family
- alvarado (Tudor–Stuart) the rousing of soldiers at dawn by beating the drum or the firing of a gun
- yomp (1982) to march with heavy equipment over difficult terrain; a forced military march in full kit
YELLOW-BELLY

Not that everyone is equally eager to join the battle:

- scurrous (1684) of one who cuts off his thumb to escape military service
- troppo (Australian slang) nervously affected by the privations of war service in the Tropics
- ear-flip (Service slang) a very cursory salute
- chamade (French 1684) the drum beat or trumpet blast which announces a surrender
- poodle-faker (Service slang 1902) an officer always ready to take part in the social side of military life

WEIGHING ANCHOR

The navy, too, has developed some colourful jargon over the years:

- anchor-faced someone, usually an officer, who lives and breathes the Royal Navy even when retired
- mushroom troop a complaining description used by those who feel that they are not being told enough about what is happening (i.e. fed on dirt and kept in the dark)
- Dockyard Olympics the old process of refitting a warship whereby all the tradesmen lined up at the start of the day and then raced off to various places within the ship
- upstairs (submariner’s jargon) the surface of the sea
- swallow the anchor to leave the navy

MAGNIFICENT MEN

Our newest military service was at first rather looked down on by the other two. But it didn’t take long to prove its usefulness:

- spike-bozzle (1915) to destroy (an enemy plane)
- bombflet (New Zealand 1940) a propaganda leaflet dropped from an aeroplane
- brolly-hop (b.1932) a parachute jump
- vrille (French 1918) an aerobatic spinning manoeuvre (twisting, like the tendril of a vine)

Whatever the difficulties …

- socked in (aerospace jargon) an airfield shut for flying because of poor visibility
- penguin (Air Force jargon 1915) an aeroplane unable to leave the ground
- dangle the Dunlops (Royal Navy jargon) to lower an aircraft’s undercarriage prior to landing or the dangers …

cigarette roll (US slang 1962) a parachute jump in which the parachute fails to open

angry palm tree (Royal Navy jargon) a burning and turning helicopter

buy the farm (US Service slang 1955) to crash an aircraft, usually fatally (referring to government compensation paid to a farmer when an aircraft crashes on his farm) at least it had its compensations:

modoc(k) (US slang 1936) a man who becomes a pilot for the sake of the glamorous image it conveys

SHOCK AND AWE

As the airforce role becomes ever more important, and the machines more powerful and hi-tech, the lingo just keeps on coming:

- green air (US slang) flying with night-vision goggles
- play pussy (RAF jargon) to fly into cloud cover in order to avoid being discovered by hostile aircraft
- glass ball environment (US intelligence jargon 2004) of the weather in Iraq being often conducive to collecting images from above

PANCAKE! – SERVICES’ WATCHWORDS

- popeye! (air intercept code) I am in cloud; I have reduced visibility
- state tiger! (air intercept code) ‘I have sufficient fuel to complete my mission as assigned’
- Geronimo! (1940s) the favoured shout of paratroopers as they leapt from airplanes
- Pancake! (Service slang) the order given in the air to land
- lumpy chicken! (US military use) loud and clear

SPOOKS

Our fourth service lurks in the shadows, complete with its own covert terms of communication:

- cut-out someone acting as a middle-man in espionage
- starburst losing a tail by having several similar cars suddenly drive off in different directions, making it hard to know which to follow
- swallow a woman employed by the Soviet intelligence service to seduce men for the purposes of espionage
- lion tamer in a blackmail operation, a strong-arm man who makes sure that the target, once told that he is being blackmailed, does not make an embarrassing and potentially destructive fuss which could thus ruin the operation
- ill arrested on suspicion for questioning
- demote maximally to kill one of your associates (the victim’s career as a spy certainly can fall no lower)

POLITICOS

We can only hope that all these fine operatives are given wise and honourable direction by that class of men and women we choose to run things for us:

- tyrekicker (New Zealand 1986) a politician who discusses and debates but takes no action (from car sales where a person examines a car at length but does not buy it)
- snollygoster (1846) a burgeoning politician (especially a shrewd or calculating one) with no platform, principles or party preference

dog-whistle politics (Australian slang 2005) to present your message so that only your supporters hear it properly

quockerwodger (mid 19C) a pseudo-politician; a politician acting in accordance with the instructions of an influential third party, rather than properly representing their constituents (a quockerwodger was a wooden toy figure which, when pulled by a string, jerked its limbs about)

moss-back (late 19C) a right-winger (as they move so slowly that moss could grow on their back)

doughnutting (UK slang 2005) a carefully created seating plan which places an ideal group of members of Parliament (women, photogenic, ethnic minority etc.) around a leader for the ideal television shot

mugwump (New York 1884) one who holds more or less aloof from party politics, professing disinterested and superior views

girouettism (1825) frequently altering one’s opinions or principles to follow trends

TWO CHEERS FOR DEMOCRACY

We live, after all, in the finest political system yet devised by man:

pot-waller (Somerset) one whose right to vote for a member of Parliament is based on his having a fireplace on which to boil his own pot

flusher (US slang 2008) a volunteer who rounds up non-voters on Election Day

astroturfing (US slang) a PR tactic in which hired acolytes are used to offer ostensibly enthusiastic and spontaneous grassroots support for a politician or business

barbecue stopper (Australian slang 2002) an issue of major public importance, which will excite the interest of voters

WORD JOURNEYS

opportune (15C from Latin via Old French) (of wind) driving towards the harbour; seasonable

bounce (13C) to beat, thump; then (16C) a loud, exploding noise

borough (Old English) a fortress the devil to pay (1783) from the time of old sailing ships when the devil was a long seam beside the keel of a ship which was sealed with tar (if there was no hot pitch ready the tide would turn before the work could be done and the ship would be out of commission longer)

SCURRYFUNGE
Domestic life

A lyttle house well fylled, a lyttle ground well tylled and a little wife well wylled is best (1545)

Pundits talk of the global village, but the world is still a huge and deeply varied place, offering any number of environments for people to settle in:

- Periscii (1625) the inhabitants of the polar circles, so called because in summer their shadows form an oval
- Ascians (1635) inhabitants of the Tropics, who twice a year have the sun directly overhead at noon (hence ‘without shadows’)
- Antiscian (1842) a person who lives on the opposite side of the Equator
- Epirot (1660) a person who lives inland
- Paralian (1664) a person who lives near the sea
- Owld standards (Lincolnshire) old folk who have lived in a village all their lives
- Carrot cruncher (UK slang) a person from the country, a rural dweller

BRIGHT LIGHTS

Countryside, town or something in between, take your pick:

- Agroville (1960) a community, a village stronghold (relating to South Vietnam)
- Tenderloin district (1887) the area of a city devoted to pleasure and entertainment, typically containing restaurants, theatres, gambling houses and brothels
- Huburb (US slang) its own little city within another city

HIGHLY SOUGHT AFTER
Local features may add to or subtract from the desirability of one’s residence:

- hippo’s tooth (US slang) a cement bollard
- witches’ knickers (Irish slang) shopping bags caught in trees, flapping in the wind
- urbeach (US slang) an urban beach generally built along a riverbank
- generica (US slang) features of the American landscape (strip malls, motel chains, prefab housing) that are exactly the same no matter where one is
- packman’s puzzle (Wales) a street or housing estate where the house numbers are allocated in a complicated fashion which causes problems to visitors, tradesmen etc.

SOILED BY ASSOCIATION

If you stay too long in one place you might saddle your children with a nickname they never asked for:

- beanbelly (17C) a native of Leicestershire (a major producer of beans)
- malt-horse (17C) a native of Bedford (from the high-quality malt extracted from Bedfordshire barley)
- yellow belly (18C) a native of Lincolnshire (especially of the southern or fenland part where the yellow-stomached frog abounds)

LOVE THY NEIGHBOUR

It’s generally wisest to try and meet the neighbours before you actually move in; though the horrid truth is that the people next door can change at any time:

- baching (New Zealand 1936) living usually apart from a family and without domestic help, ‘doing for oneself’ (especially of a male)
- scurryfunge (coastal American 1975) a hasty tidying of the house between the time you see a neighbour and the time she knocks on the door
- exhibition meal (Hobo slang) a handout eaten on the doorstep: the madam wants the neighbours to witness her generosity
- flying pasty (c.1790) excrement wrapped in paper that is thrown over a neighbour’s wall
- to have the key of the street (b.1881) of a person who has no house to go to at night, or is shut out from his own

HOUSEPROUD

Once you’ve settled in, though, you’re free to make what you like of the rooms …

- piggery (UK college slang early 20C) a room in which one does just as one wishes and which is rarely cleaned
- chambradeese (Scotland) the best bedroom
-ぬelle (Tudor–Stuart) the space in a bedroom between the bed and the wall
- but and ben (Geordie) outside and inside (refers to a two-roomed house with an outer and inner room) though you’re all too likely to become swamped in the details of domesticity:

- flisk (Gloucestershire) a brush to remove cobwebs
- izels (Lincolnshire) particles of soot floating about in a room, indicating that the chimney needs to be swept
- beggar’s velvet (1847) downy particles which accumulate under furniture from the negligence of housemaids
- winter-hedge (Yorkshire 18C) a clothes-horse (from the way a full clothes-horse ‘hedged off’ a portion of a room: summer washing was dried out of doors)
- wemble (Lincolnshire) to invert a basin or saucepan on a shelf so that dust does not settle on the inside
- poss (Shropshire) to splash up and down in the water, as washerwomen do when rinsing their clothes just make sure you don’t take it so far that you upset your cohabitants …

spannel (Sussex) to make dirty foot marks on a clean floor heel (Gloucestershire) to upset a bucket spang (Lincolnshire) to shut a door by flicking the handle sharply so that it slams without being held

HOUSEWARMING

With the place spick and span, perhaps it’s time to throw that party:

sin-kettling (New Zealand 1874) a house-warming custom whereby a newly wed couple were welcomed by friends and neighbours circling the marriage home banging on kerosene tins until provided with refreshments euddle puddle (New York slang 2002) a heap of exhausted ravers buff-ball (1880) a party where everyone dances naked

THE THREE NIGHT RULE

A well-known proverb says that fish and guests go off after three nights, so if you ask people to stay for longer, make sure you have some way of getting rid of them if need be:

shwertnick (Old English law) entertaining a sheriff for three nights agenhina (Saxon law) a guest at an inn who, after having stayed for three nights, was considered one of the family sit eggs (US black slang 1970s) to overstay one’s welcome (from the image of a hen awaiting her chicks)

BATHTIME

Because, in the end, what could be nicer than closing the front door to all outsiders and taking the relaxing ablution of your choice:

offald (Yorkshire) tired and dirty, in need of a bath muck-rawk (Yorkshire) a dirty line (e.g. on neck) showing the limit of where it has been washed cowboy (US slang) a quick bath using little water (since cowboys bathed sparingly) psychrolutist (1872) one who bathes in the open air daily throughout the winter

BEDDY-BYES

Before sinking into a well-deserved rest, wherever in the house the fancy takes you:

nid-nod (1787) to nod off
Counting rivets (Royal Navy jargon) going to sleep: it refers to lying down and looking at the rivets above the bunk

Hypnopompic (1901) the fuzzy state between being awake and asleep

To sleep in puppy’s parlour (Newfoundland 1771) to sleep on the floor in one’s clothes

Bodkin (1638) a person wedged in between two others when there is proper room for two only (a bodkin was a small sharp dagger)

Admiral’s watch (underworld slang 1905) a good night’s sleep

To drive one’s pigs to market (US 19C) to snore

---

WORD JOURNEYS

detect (15C from Latin) to unroof climax (from Ancient Greek) a ladder; then (16C) in rhetoric, an ascending series of expressions curfew (13C from Old French: couvre feu) to cover the fire

You may beat a horse till he be sad, and a cow till she be mad

(1678)

In a world where dogs are unclean in some cultures and on the menu in others, the British Isles is one place where the life of the average mutt might not be so bad:

- snuzzle (1861) to poke around with one’s nose, as dogs do
- flew (1575) the pendulous corner of the upper lip of certain dogs, such as the bloodhound
- kill (Gloucestershire) used of the tongue of a dog dropping his saliva
- slink (Shropshire) to draw back, as a dog does when about to bite
- pudding (underworld slang 1877) liver drugged for the silencing of house-dogs
- ar dawg’s a sooner (Ulster) my dog prefers to pee on the carpet rather than go outside

GRIMALKIN

Our other favourite domestic animal is supposed to have nine lives and knows how to enjoy all of them:

- ess-rook (Shropshire) a cat that likes to lie in the ashes on the hearth
- awl-down (Somerset) to smooth down a cat’s back
- brebit (Shropshire) a cat that continually hunts for food
- furs bush (Sussex) the cat’s tune when purring

PRANCERS AND DOBBINS

The Queen is said to prefer horses to people, and there’s little doubt they get to mix in the best of company:

- foosple (Cumberland 1783) the impression of a horse’s hoof upon soft ground
- trizzling (Devon) the slow, lazy trot of horses
- brills (1688) a horse’s eyelashes
- skewboglish (Lincolnshire) a horse that is apt to shy
- peeaster (Yorkshire) a horse making less effort than the others in a team
- feague (UK slang b.1811) to put ginger or a live eel into a horse’s anus to make him lively and carry his tail well
- jipping (horsetraders’ slang mid 19C) staining part of a horse with Indian ink to conceal a blemish

LIVESTOCK

It’s all very well going to the races, but where would we be without the milk and cheese from our herds of Jerseys and Guernseys (to say nothing of the beef from Herefords, Galloways and Lincolns)?

- ganners (Shetland Isles) the inside of a cow’s lips
- noit (Yorkshire) the period during which a cow gives milk
• Tulchan (1789) calf’s skin set beside a cow to make her give milk freely
• Shick (Caithness) to set the head as a bull does when intending to toss
• Giddhom (Ireland) the frantic galloping of cows plagued with flies

LAND OF THE LONG WHITE FLEECE

Sheep are the animal most mentioned in the bible (lions and lambs came in second and third). In New Zealand, where there have long been more sheep than people, a whole separate language grew up for talking about them:

• Break back (1864) to run or dash in the reverse direction to the drive
• Pink (1897) to shear a sheep carefully and so closely that the skin shows
• Saddle (1910) to mark an unsatisfactorily shorn sheep
• Huntaway (1912) a noisy sheepdog trained to bark on command and drive sheep forward from behind
• Drummer (1897) the worst or slowest sheep-shearer in a team
• Cobbler (late 19C) the last and least willing sheep to be sheared

PORKER

In strong competition with the Danes, our hogs and sows do their level best to bring home the bacon:

• Hodge (Shropshire) the large paunch in a pig
• Wurtle (Cumberland) to work underneath or in the ground like a pig
• Treseltrype (Somerset 1883) the youngest in a litter of pigs

FOWL PLAY

Some birds we keep as hunters or pets, some we breed to mow down with guns, a few we eat …

• Turdoid (1823) akin to a thrush
• Estreger (1400) a keeper of goshawks
• Back (1575) eagles before they become acclimatized and can hunt on their own
• Essiger (Orkney Isles) the condition of a fowl when moulting
• Jollop (1688) to gobble like a turkey
• Zooro (Gloucestershire) a wood pigeon (from the sound it makes)

… but they’re always worth listening to:

• Quit-quit (Wiltshire 1900) the note of the swallow
• Quee-beck (Scotland 1901) the cry of grouse when startled
• Hoolie-gool-oo-oo (Banffshire 1876) the cry, hooting of an owl
• Valentine (1851) to greet with song at mating-time (said of birds)
• Ehavish (1674) the sound of many birds chirping together, or many people chatting at once

QUEENS AND WORKERS

In other parts of the world they eat fried grasshopper and chocolate-coated ants; but with one glorious exception, insects are not much help in our national diet:

• Warp (Tudor–Stuart) bees in flight working themselves forward
• Eut (Gloucestershire) the second swarm of bees in the same season (hob or kive: the third swarm of bees)
• Spear (Sussex) the sting of a bee
• Narrow-wriggle (East Anglian) an earwig (the Yorkshire version is forkin robins) dulosis (Modern Latin 1904) the enslavement of ants by ants

GREAT AND SMALL

The ordinary garden mole was known in Middle English (1100–1500) as a mowdiarp. Later he became known as the little gentleman in black velvet (early 18C), the subject of a famous Jacobite toast to the mole that raised the hill that caused their oppressor King William to fall from his horse and die. Other animals have avoided such glorification …

fuz-pig (Somerset) a hedgehog bubbly jock (Scottish) a turkey pilsen (b.1828) the moth or fly that runs into a candle flame

… but nonetheless their most obscure parts have been carefully noted …

junk (New Zealand 1837) the soft part of a sperm-whale’s head dewlap (1398) the pendulous skin under the throat of cattle, dogs etc.
cnidocil (1884) a stinging bristle of the tentacle of a jellyfish katmoget (Shetland Isles 1897) having the colour of its belly different from the rest of the body

acnestis (1807) that part of an animal (between its shoulders and lower back) that it cannot reach to scratch fleck (Essex) the soft hair of a rabbit

… not to mention their intriguing behaviours …

mather (Gloucestershire) to turn round before lying down, as an animal often does squeem (Ayrshire) the motion of a fish as observed by its effect on the surface of the water pronk (1896) to leap through the air, as an antelope does traffic (Gloucestershire) the tracks worn by rabbits or rats near their holes

… to say nothing of their mating habits …

epigamic (1890) attracting the opposite sex at breeding time elicket (b.1811) the copulation of foxes amplexus (1930s) the mating embrace of a frog and a toad eaterwaul (Middle English) the cry of cats at mating time

YELLS BELLS
At rutting time a badger shrieks or yells; a boar freams; a buck groans or troats; a fox barks; a goat rattles; a hare or rabbit beats or taps; a hart bells; an otter whiles; a roe bellows and a wolf howls.

SAFETY IN NUMBERS

Most of us know that geese on the ground come in gaggles. But were you aware that when they take to the air they become a skein? The collective nouns for other animals are often bizarre in the extreme:

- a murder of crows
- a watch of nightingales
- an unkindness of ravens
- a crash of rhinoceroses
- a deceit of lapwings
- a convocation of eagles
- a business of ferrets
- a wedge of swans

JUG JUG IN BERKELEY SQUARE

When it comes to the sounds of animals, some of our attempts at mimicry may leave something to be desired:

- eurkle (1693) to cry as a quail
- winx (15C) to bray like a donkey
- desticate (1623) to squeak like a rat
- ehirr (1639) to make a trilling sound like a grasshopper
- eigling (1693) chirping like the cicada
- jug (1523) the sound of the nightingale
- skirr (1870) a whirring or grating sound, as of the wings of birds in flight
- gi’-me-trousers (Jamaican English 1958) the sound a cock makes when it crows

PEN AND INK

In Lincolnshire, the sounds of horses’ hoofs were onomatopoeically described as butter and eggs, butter and eggs for a horse at a canter. If the animal happened to be a clicker, that is, it caught its front hoofs on its rear ones when it was running, there were extra beats in the rhythm and it went hammer and pinchers, hammer and pinchers. A horse at a gallop went pen and ink, pen and ink.

RUTH RUTH

And who knows how this strange variety of human calls to animals developed over the years?

- muther-wut (Sussex) a carter’s command to a horse to turn right
- woor-ree (East Anglian 1893) a waggoner or ploughman’s call to his horse to come to the right
- harley-harthor (Norfolk 1879) a call to horses to go to the left
- aw whoop (Gloucestershire) an order for a horse to go on
- swyee (Northern) a peculiar noise made in speaking to a horse
- pynt ye (Cheshire) what milkmaids say to their cows when they have milked them (similar to aroint thee – get ye gone)
- ruth ruth (Ireland) an encouragement to a bull to service a cow
- habbocraws (Scotland 1824) a shout used to frighten the crows from the cornfields way leggo (New Zealand 1945) a musterer’s cry to recall a dog midda-whoy (Lincolnshire) an instruction to a horse to turn left bumbeerey-bizz (Lanarkshire) a cry used by children when they see cows startled, in order to excite them to run about with greater violence soho (1307) a call used by huntsmen to direct the attentions of a dog to a hare which has been discovered whoo-up (Lancashire and Yorkshire 1806) a shout of huntsmen at the death of the quarry poot, poot, poot (Orkney Isles) a call to young pigs at feeding time hreddy-yow (Yorkshire) a call to sheep being brought down from the fell, to come closer poa poa (Northamptonshire) a call to turkeys

shangle (Cumbria) to fasten a tin or kettle to a dog’s tail
hamble (1050) to make a dog useless for hunting by cutting the balls of its feet
brail (1828) the leather strap to bind a hawk’s wing
gablok (1688) a spur attached to the heel of a fighting cock bdellatomy (1868) the act of cutting a sucking leech to increase its suction spanghew (1781) blowing up a frog through a straw inserted into its anus; the inflated frog was then jerked into the middle of the pond by being put on a cross stick, the other end being struck, so that it jumped high into the air

RSPCA

However good we are as a nation to our furry and feathered friends, there’s certainly no room for complacency:

shangle (Cumbria) to fasten a tin or kettle to a dog’s tail
hamble (1050) to make a dog useless for hunting by cutting the balls of its feet
brail (1828) the leather strap to bind a hawk’s wing
gablok (1688) a spur attached to the heel of a fighting cock
bdellatomy (1868) the act of cutting a sucking leech to increase its suction
spanghew (1781) blowing up a frog through a straw inserted into its anus; the inflated frog was then jerked into the middle of the pond by being put on a cross stick, the other end being struck, so that it jumped high into the air

EXCREMENTAL

American slang has the phrase alley or road apple for a lump of horse manure. Back home in the Middle Ages the language of hunting meant that you didn’t need slang to describe the specific faeces of an animal: there were the crotels of a hare, the friants of a boar, the spraints of an otter, the werderobe of a badger, the wagging of a fox and the fumets of a deer.

WORD JOURNEYS

mawkish (17C) from a maggot; nauseated tabby (1630s) from Attabiyah, a quarter of Baghdad, renowned for its production of striped cloth rostrum (16C from Latin) a bird’s beak; then from the orator’s platform in the Roman forum which was adorned with the prows of captured ships white elephant (1851) from successive kings of Thailand who gave a white elephant to any courtier who irritated them; although the animals were considered sacred, their maintenance was so expensive that anyone who was given one was inevitably ruined
SWALLOCKY

Rural life and weather

Spring is here when you can tread on nine daisies at once on the village green

(1910)

Out in the sticks are things not dreamt of by those who remain in town:

- goodman’s croft (Scotland 19C) a corner of a field left untilled, in the belief that unless some such place were left, evil would befall the crop
- loggers (Wiltshire) lumps of dirt on a ploughboy’s feet
- sludman (1674) a scarecrow made of old garments
- icker (1513) a single ear of corn
- squeaker (Newfoundland 1878) a blade of grass held upright between the thumbs and producing a shrill vibration when blown upon
- cowpat roulette (Somerset 2004) a game in which villagers bet on which plot of land will be the first to receive a cow’s calling card

---

FIGHTING FOR THE CLAICK

Dialects and local language identify particular aspects important to rural folk …

- plud (Somerset) the swampy surface of a wet ploughed field
- fleet (Somerset) the windward side of a hedge
- wanflet (Aberdeenshire) the water of a mill stream, after passing the mill
- chimp (Wiltshire) the grown-out shoot of a stored potato
- griggles (Wiltshire) small worthless apples remaining on the tree after the crop has been gathered in
… as well as gadgets and techniques that have been developed over long years of experiment:

- atchett (Devon and Cornwall) a pole slung across a stream to stop cattle passing
- averruncator (1842) a long stick with shears for cutting high branches
- stercoration (1605) the process of spreading manure
- baggin-bill (Shropshire) an implement for reaping peas
- reesome (Lincolnshire) to place peas in small heaps
- elaick (Scotland) the last armful of grain cut at harvest (also called the kirk-cut, mulden, or kirk-baby: it was often kept and hung by a ribbon above the fireplace; in Suffolk harvesters threw their sickles to compete to reap it)

GREEN FINGERS

On a smaller scale, gardeners always have plenty to talk about …

- platiecrub (Shetland Isles) a patch of enclosed ground for growing cabbages
- olitory (1658) belonging to the kitchen garden
- chessom (1626) of soil; without stones or grit
- pissabed (Jamaican English 1801) a dandelion (as it is a diuretic)

… and things can get pretty technical on occasion:

- suckshin (Yorkshire) liquid manure
- sarcle (1543) to dig up weeds with a hoe
- graff (Shropshire) a spade’s depth in digging (delve is two spades’ depth)
- ochel (Sussex) too much for a wheelbarrow but not enough for a cart

BOSKY

Out on the slopes beyond the hedge the trees too need careful categorizing:

- maerapeldre (Anglo-Saxon) an apple-tree on a boundary
- pollard (Newfoundland c.1900) a dead tree still standing
- rampick (1593) a tree bare of leaves or twigs
- stub-shot (Somerset) the portion of the trunk of a tree which remains when the tree is not sawn through

… and beyond that, Nature may be wilder and more magnificent still:

- borstal (South English 1790) a pathway up to a steep hill
- brucktummuck (Jamaican English 1943) a hill so steep that it seems to break the stomach of one who tries to climb it

UP ON THE DOWNS

Critics from abroad often claim that English weather is dreadful. But this is only one point of view; for others relish the huge variety of effects to be found in such a changeable climate. These are just those found in Sussex:

- port-boys small low clouds in a clear sky
- windogs white clouds blown by the wind
- edenbite a mass of cloud in the form of a loop
- slatch a brief respite or interval in the weather
- swallocky sultry weather
shucky  unsettled weather truggy  dirty weather
egger-nogger  sleet
smither diddles  bright spots on either side of the sun

THE RAIN IT RAINETH EVERYDAY …

It may rain often but that’s not to say that there aren’t some happy aspects to the experience:

- petrichor (1964) the pleasant smell that accompanies the first rain after a dry spell
- eske (Orkney Isles) small spots of rain that precede a heavy storm
- fog dog (mid 19C) the lower part of a rainbow
- water-gall (Tudor–Stuart) a second rainbow seen above the first
- monkey’s wedding (South African 1968) simultaneous rain and sunshine although its less enjoyable side is also well documented …

- trashlifter (Californian slang) a heavy rain (loglifter: a really heavy rain)
- duck’s frost (Sussex dialect) cold rain rather than freezing
- New York rain (Hong Kong slang) the local term for water that drips annoyingly from air-conditioners onto passers-by or those who live on coasts and hills, the wind has always been a constant presence:

- piipple (Tudor–Stuart) to blow with a gentle sound (of the wind)
- wyvel (Wiltshire) to blow as wind does round a corner or through a hole
- whiffle (1662) to blow, displace or scatter with gusts of air; to flicker or flutter as if blown by the wind not to be trifled with if you’re out on the water …

- williwaw (1842) a sudden and powerful downdraught of wind (originally in the Straits of Magellan)
- the dog before its master (nautical late 19C) a heavy swell preceding a gale or a storm is imminent …

- brattle (Newcastle 1815) the noise of a thunderclap
- rounce robble hobble (b.1582) a representation of the tumult of thunder heofonwoma (Anglo-Saxon) thunder and lightning, literally a terrible noise from heaven

levin (13C) a bolt of lightning

THE LIVING IS EASY

Every now and then the sun appears, and everyone goes crazy with delight:

- apricate (1691) to bask in the sun
- erizzlies (1876) rough, sunburnt places on the face and hands in scorching weather
- jack-a-dandy (Shropshire) the dancing light sometimes seen on a wall or ceiling, reflected from the sunshine on water, glass or other bright surface
- king’s-weather (Scotland 18C) the exhalations seen rising from the earth during a warm day (while queen’s weather (19C) is a fine day for a fête as Queen Victoria was famous for having fine weather when she appeared in public)

SNOW ON THE LINE

While at the other end of the year the country grinds to a halt for another reason:

- devil’s blanket (Newfoundland) a snowfall which hinders work or going to school
- pitchen (Bristol) snow that is settling
- cloggins (Cumberland) balls of snow on the feet
- tewtle (Yorkshire) to snow just a few flakes
- sluppra (Shetland Isles) half-melted snow

although the novelty does often rather pass after the building of the second snowman:

- two thieves beating a rogue (b.1811) a man beating his hands against his sides to warm himself in cold weather (also known as beating the booby and cuffing Jonas)
- to beat the goose (c.1880) to strike the hands across the chest and under the armpits to warm one’s chilled fingers (the movement supposedly resembles a goose in flight)
- shrammed (Bristol) feeling really cold

WORD JOURNEYS

- aftermath (16C) after mowing (i.e. the second crop of grass in autumn)
- derive (14C from Latin via Old French) to draw away from the river bank
- damp (14C) noxious vapour, gas; then (16C) fog, mist, depression, stupor
- sky (13C from Old Norse) a cloud
- aloof (nautical 16C) windward
FEELIMAGEERIES

Paraphernalia

None are so great enemies to knowledge as they that know nothing at all

(1586)

The English language has a name for pretty much everything, even things you’ve never imagined needing to describe:

- feazings (1825) the frayed and unravelled ends of a rope
- ouch (Tudor–Stuart) the socket of a precious stone
- swarf (1566) the metallic dust that accumulates after sharpening or grinding metal
- ferrule (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby 1838) the metal tip on an umbrella
- nittiness (1664) the condition of being full of small air bubbles

DRIBS AND DRABS

If that wasn’t enough, dialect supplies a few more:

- charmings (Lincolnshire) paper or rag chewed into small pieces by mice
- swailing (Rutland) wax drips from a candle
- smut (Dublin) the remains of a nearly burnt-out candle
- catamaran (Devon 1836) anything very rickety and unsafe
- swiggle (East Anglia) to shake liquid in an enclosed vessel
- noraleg (Shetland Isles 1899) a needle with a broken eye

ROUGHLY SPEAKING

When it comes to describing other aspects of objects, there are some surprisingly useful words out there:

- scrawmax (Lincolnshire) anything badly formed or out of shape
- ullage (1297) the amount of liquid by which a container falls short of being full
- wee-wow (Shropshire) more on one side than on the other, ill-balanced, shaky
- attywampus (US Middle and Southern slang) diagonally across from something else
- by scowl of brow (Gloucestershire) judging by the eye instead of by measurement
- ostrobogulous (1951) unusual, bizarre, interesting

… as there are for directions too:

- widdershins (1513) in the opposite direction, the wrong way
- deasil (1771) clockwise, or ‘in the direction of the sun’s course’ (considered by some to bring bad luck)
- antisyzgy (1863) a union of opposites
COUNTING SHEEP

Being able to count was a matter of survival long before education for all. Yan Tan Tethera is a numerical sequence once used widely by shepherds in northern England and southern Scotland to count their sheep. It was also used in knitting to count stitches. The words differ according to accent and locale (in the Lake District versions alter according to which valley you find yourself in). In Westmorland it goes like this:

Yan · Tahn · Teddera · Meddera · Pimp (5) · Settera · Lettera · Hovera · Dovera · Dick (10) · Yan Dick · Tahn Dick · Teddera Dick · Meddera Dick · Bumfit (15) · Yan-a-Bumfit · Tahn-a Bumfit · Teddera-Bumfit · Meddera-Bumfit · Jiggot (20)

The monotonous nature of the rhyme, which would have been repeated many times during the day, also supposedly gave rise to the idea of ‘counting sheep’ in order to get off to sleep.

WHO WANTS TO BE A VIGINTILLIONAIRE?

When numbers give way to mathematics, things start to get a bit more daunting:

• zenzizenzizenzic (1557) the eighth power of a number
• lemniscate (1781) the ∞ or ‘infinity’ symbol
• preantepenult (1791) the fourth last
• shake a unit of time equal to a hundred-millionth of a second (from top secret operations during the Second World War based on the expression ‘two shakes of a lamb’s tail’, indicating a very short time interval)
• vigintillion (1857) the number expressed as a one followed by sixty-three zeros

EVEN STEVENS

Colloquial English takes delight in rhyming expressions, officially known as Reduplicative Rhyming Compounds:

• nibby-gibby (Cornwall 1854) touch and go
• winky-pinky (Yorkshire) a nursery word for sleepy
• hockerty-cockerty (Scotland 1742) with one leg on each shoulder
• inchy-pinchy (Warwickshire) the boy’s game of progressive leapfrog
• fidge-fadge (Yorkshire) a motion between walking and trotting
• boris-noris (Dorset) careless, reckless, happy-go-lucky
• wiffle-waffle (Northamptonshire) to whet one’s scythes together

Shropshire, in particular, has some fine examples:

• aunty-praunty (Ellesmere) high-spirited, proud
• bang-swang (Clee Hills) without thought, headlong
• holus-bolus impulsively, without deliberation
• opple-scopple (Clun) to scramble for sweets as children do

This is not just a local phenomenon, as these transatlantic modern versions demonstrate:

• stitch ‘n’ bitch sewing or knitting while exchanging malicious gossip
• denture venturer a long trip away from work pre-retirement
• chop shop a stolen car disassembly place
• zero-hero the designated driver: someone who doesn’t drink alcohol at a social gathering etc. to drive those who do drink home safely

YOUR NUMBER’S UP

In the drugstores of 1930s America, staff often found it easier to talk in numerical code about certain sensitive matters:

13 a boss is roaming
14 a special order
86 we’re out of what was just ordered; to refuse to serve a customer 87½ a pretty woman just walked in 95 a customer is walking out without paying 98 the manager is here

MMMMMM …

We all know there are twenty-six letters in the alphabet. But don’t think that’s the end of it:

ızzard (Swift 1738) an archaic name for Z ımbdoidal (1653) shaped like the letter L ıtıle (1538) the little dot above the letter i (it’s also the name for a pip on dice) ıyoid (1811) having a U shape ôtchorpe (US 1960s) the official name of the ‘#’ (aka the hash mark) anınotated (b.1913) anything bent somewhat like the letter S (from heraldry) ınytacism (b.1913) the incorrect or excessive use of the letter M

NEVER ODD OR EVEN: PALINDROMES

The English word palindrome was coined by the playwright Ben Jonson in around 1629 to describe words that read the same forwards as backwards; an ongoing source of fun with phrases too:

no, it is opposition
Niagara, o roar again!
rats live on no evil star
nurse, I spy gypsies, run!
murder for a jar of red rum harass sensuousness, Sarah

SOUND EFFECTS

Noises sometimes seem to defy description. But not in this language:

fremscence (Thomas Carlyle 1837) an incipient roaring rimbombo (1873) a booming roar cloop (1848) drawing a cork from a bottle phoric (1839) the hollow sound produced by blowing across the mouth of a bottle weep (Kipling: Life’s Hand 1891) a steel weapon when drawn from a sheath allithumpian (1836) a big parade, usually accompanied by a band of discordant instruments rip-rap (1894) fireworks detonating swabble (1848) water being sloshed around erepitation (1656) the crackling and popping sound of a wood fire jarg (1513) the creaking of a door or gate juck-cum-peng (Jamaican English 1943) a wooden-legged person walking whiffle (1972) a soft sound as of gently moving air or water

TINCTURE

We can all name the primary colours: red, yellow and blue; not to mention the secondaries: purple, green and orange; after that, it’s anyone’s guess:

gamboge (1634) bright yellow (from gum-resin) sfulvous (1664) tawny, yellow tinged with red stantine (1609) violet coloured glaucous (1671) a pale green passing into greyish blue acreous (1841) a pearly lustre lyard (Chaucer c.1386) silvery grey almost white

VERY FLAT, NORFOLK

Dialects have their own words for colour, often reflecting the landscapes they come from:

blake (Cumberland) a yellowish golden colour buzzom (Newfoundland) purplish tint, heather-coloured; of flesh, blue or discoloured watchet (Midlands 1891) light blue unduckytimur (Norfolk and Suffolk) a dull, indescribable colour

UP BETIMES

Time waits for no man. So we might as well be certain precisely what we mean:

ughten (971) the dusk just before dawn blue o’clock in the morning (1886) pre-dawn, when black sky gives way to purple beetle-belch (RAF jargon) an ungodly hour sparrow-fart (b.1910) daybreak, very early morning beever (Sussex) eleven o’clock luncheon upright and downstraight (Sussex) bedtime when the clock says six blind-man’s-holiday (Shropshire) twilight cockshut (1594) evening time

PROVIDENTIAL

If you want something to come off well, choose your date with care:

Egyptian day (Yorkshire) an unlucky day, a Friday, which was a day of abstinence pully-lug day (Cumberland 1886) a day on which traditionally ears might be pulled with impunity cucumber time (b.1810) the quiet season in the tailoring trade (hence the expression tailors are vegetarians as they live on cucumber when without work)

Saint Tibb’s Eve (Cornwall) a day that never comes when hens make holy water (1631) never

THINGUMMY

When all is said and done, however, there are just some things that remain very hard to put your finger on:

oojiboo (1918) an unnamed thing, a whatsit feelimageeries (Scotland 1894) knick-knacks, odds and ends hab nab (1580) at random, at the mercy of chance, hit or miss gazodjule (Australian slang) a name for an object of which one cannot remember the name floccinaucinihilipilification (1741) the categorizing of something that is useless or trivial

WORD JOURNEYS

point-blank (16C from French) a white spot (as in a target) punctual (14C from Latin) pertinent to a point or dot normal (17C from Latin via French) rectangular, perpendicular paraphernalia (17C from Ancient Greek) articles of personal property which the law allows a married woman to regard as her own algebra (14C from Arabic via Medieval Latin) the reunion of broken parts
Obviously, not to be confused with hangouderen (Dutch), pensioners who have nothing to do but hang around in considerable numbers in shopping malls and hamburger bars (literally, hanging elderly)
Slang that works when read or written backwards
